PREFACE.

FULLY ſenſible of the magnitude and extent of the taſk in which I am engaged, this portion of the History of Leicestershire is ſubmitted to public inſpection at a much earlier period than was at firſt intended[1]. When I reflect, however, that ſome merit might be claimed, if it were only for bringing to light the profound reſearches of my coadjutors; and am alſo conſcious that in all caſes endeavours have been uſed to obtain correctneſs, and to guard againſt miſrepreſentation; I look forward with confidence to ſome ſmall degree of honeſt fame.

The moſt material of the many reaſons which might be aſſigned for publiſhing a part only of ſo large a Work is, that the nature of the plan may be more diſtinctly underſtood. For this purpoſe, a complete Hundred is given, as a ſpecimen of the Five which remain; which, it is hoped, will receive conſiderable improvement, as well from the merits as the defects of that now exhibited; ſince it muſt be in the power of gentlemen in every particular diſtrict to point out corrections and improvements[2].

Acknowledgements to individuals, too numerous to be here ſpecified, will appear in their reſpective places: yet many of them, even in this curſory notice, it would be unpardonable to ſuppreſs; particularly ſo, were not the Rev. Sir Charles Cave to be diſtinguiſhed, from whom the ground-work of this undertaking was obtained; the Collections formed by his father in the courſe of many years, in addition to the labours of Mr. Burton; augmented by copious tranſcripts from the Chetwynd library, the MSS. of Mr. Roper[3], Mr. Palmer, Mr. Wadland[4], Mr. Sanderſon, and ſeveral other antiquaries, eſpecially thoſe of the Rev. Francis Peck[5], including the regiſters of Croxton abbey and Belvoir priory; and ſome few fragments of ſir W. Dugdale[6].

The Collections of Thomas Staveley, eſq. and the Rev. Samuel Carte, with ſeveral original MSS.[7] and ſome engraved plates, were the gift of a learned Dignitary of the Church, from whom the publick long expected a Hiſtory of his native town of Leiceſter; and the handſome manner in which this has been publicly noticed is an inducement for wiſhing to deſerve the compliment which Dr. Farmer has beſtowed[8].

[1] "Many leave the labours of half their life to their executors and to chance, becauſe they will not ſend them abroad unfiniſhed, and are unable to finiſh them, having preſcribed to themſelves ſuch a degree of exactneſs as human diligence can ſcarcely attain. 'Lloyd,' ſays Burnet, 'did not lay out his learning with the ſame diligence as he laid it in.' He was always heſitating and enquiring, raiſing objections and removing them, and waiting for clearer light and fuller diſcovery. Baker, after many years paſſed in biography, left his manuſcripts to be buried in a library, becauſe that was imperfect which could never be perfected. Of theſe learned men, let thoſe who aſpire to the ſame praiſe, imitate the diligence, and avoid the ſcrupuloſity." Dr. Johnson.

[2] "Errors in a work of this nature will unavoidably attend the moſt laborious, exact, and ſkilful collector of the remains of Antiquity. Much more, therefore, are my endeavours ſubject to ſuch misfortunes, which, I hope, are the more venial, as my zeal to preſerve and (to the beſt of my knowledge) digeſt a more particular and full account of the ſituation and circumſtance of this county in former ages than has yet appeared, and thereby oblige the curious who are proprietors of lands, or at leaſt bear ſome filial regard to that county which gave them birth, is the ſpring that has urged my endeavours. Indulgence will ſurely be allowed alſo for many accounts that are given to a compiler, which, though to be ranked under the title of falſe intelligence, are not diſcernible from real and true relation, till the weight of the preſs has given ſuch paragraphs a ſtamp too heavy to be eraſed; and to this I may add the contrary diſpoſition of many perſons, who, though requeſted to beſtow information, are ſo incommunicative as not to throw the leaſt mite into theſe collections. In caſes of deficiency, therefore, gentlemen may thank themſelves for not informing." Sir T. Cave.

[3] "From a printed copy of Mr. Burton's, embelliſhed with many additions in MS. by Samuel Roper, eſq. a member of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, I have received great aſſiſtance, particularly with regard to antient deeds and evidences. Mr. Roper was contemporary with ſir William Dugdale, Mr. Burton, Mr. Gaſcoigne, and many other learned Antiquaries of the laſt century." Sir T. Cave.

[4] Father of the firſt wife of the elder Lawrence Carter, eſq. (whoſe ſon was three times one of the repreſentatives in parliament for the borough of Leiceſter, recorder there 1696, and afterward one of the barons of the Exchequer). Mr. Wadland's copy of Burton came into the poſſeſſion of Mr. Thomas Peck, ſome time clerk of the peace for the county.

[5] Whoſe copy of Burton, with MS notes, I have ſince purchaſed.

[6] "Such ſcraps as theſe are the materials out of which a book of Antiquities muſt be compoſed; and, however contemptible they may appear in the eyes of a faſtidious critic, aliter non fit liber," ſays my friend Mr. Gifford.

[7] Amongſt theſe is a curious volume extracted from antient records, with this title: "Labore & ſtudio Thomæ Jakes factus eſt hic liber, continens Feoda domini Haſtings, ratione Mariæ uxoris ejus, dominæ Botreaux, Hungerford, Molins, & Moyles, anno quinto Henrici Septimi regis Angliæ, 1489."

[8] "This work was juſt begun at the preſs, when the writer was called to the ſuperintendance of a large college, and was obliged to decline the undertaking. The plates, however, and ſome of the materials, have been long ago put into the hands of a gentleman who is every way qualified to make a proper uſe of them." Eſſay on the Learning of Shakeſpeare, 1789, p. 95.

Another friend has expreſſed an unwillingneſs that his name ſhould be mentioned. He had employed a large portion of an active life in a ſtudy very little underſtood, the early conſtitution of this kingdom; but, being accidentally drawn from the metropolis, about ten years ago, to the tranquillity of a rectory in the county of Leiceſter, his intention on this ſubject had remained ſuſpended till I announced my intention of publiſhing this Hiſtory of the County; when, with the utmoſt frankneſs and alacrity, he extracted for me the quinteſſence of his labours; which I ſhall have the pleaſure of laying before the publick as Memoirs of the Earls of Leiceſter. The Rev. Sambrook Nicholas Ruſſell will be readily diſcovered by every antiquary; and I cannot deny myſelf the ſatisfaction I feel in expreſſing my obligations to him.

The Rev. William Peters has favoured me with drawings of Wolſthorp ruined church and of his delightful parſonage at Knipton, and with a liſt of the pictures at Belvoir. From the minority of the noble Duke who owns this princely domain, I have hitherto been deprived of an opportunity of ſoliciting for plates of the elegant tombs of eight ſucceſſive earls of Rutland which grace the church of Bottesford, or of their portraits which adorn the gallery at Belvoir; but have prepared the way for it, by engraving the tombs, whereſoever diſperſed, of the lords Ros, predeceſſors of the earlieſt earl, and have taken ſome pains to elucidate the hiſtory of the family from the Conqueſt to the preſent day.

The earl of Harborough has communicated a ſplendid pedigree of the Sherards; and enriched the work with eight fine plates of the memorials of his anceſtors at Stapleford, and of their monuments in the church rebuilt by his munificence.

Earl Ferrers has perſonally condeſcended to alleviate my labours, by extracts from the original regiſter of Bredon priory, by copies of deeds and ſeals in his own archives, and from the moſt copious pedigree I have ever yet ſeen. His lordſhip has alſo directed two beautiful views of his noble houſe at Staunton Harold, and another of his old manſion at Ragdale, to be engraved at his expence.

The earl of Stamford has honoured me with ſeveral communications; amongſt which are the MS notes from a copy of Burton which was Mr. W. Staveley's; and, under his lordſhip's patronage, are engraved three views of Bradgate, the favourite reſidence of lady Jane Grey, both in its original and preſent ſtate.

The earl of Denbigh has had the condeſcenſion to ſupply a good account of the Feilding family, from an original MS. of great authenticity; and under the pariſh of Lutterworth will be ſeen ſome engraved proofs of his lordſhip's generoſity.

The earl of Leiceſter allows me to inſcribe to him that part of the work which contains the ſeries of his illuſtrious predeceſſors; and has indulged me with a tranſcript of ſo much of the original Regiſter of Tutbury priory as relates to this county.

Under Nether Broughton, Old Dalby, and Tilton, I have received ſome material aſſiſtance from the earl of Radnor.

The beauties of Caſtle Donington, and the fine remains at Aſhby, will be capital embelliſhments under the auſpices of their noble owner, earl Moira; whoſe muniments will furniſh many intereſting particulars of the antient family of Haſtings, which this gallant peer ſo worthily repreſents.

To ſuppoſe that the patronage of lord viſcount Wentworth with reſpect to Kirkby Malory can be withheld, would be an inſult to his lordſhip's known benevolence.

Lord viſcount Melbourne, and the late lord Sondes, in a moſt obliging manner, anſwered ſeveral applications to them.

By the marquis of Lanſdowne, whoſe library contains ineſtimable treaſures, I have been favoured with a Regiſter of the Abbey of Gerendon; and by Craven Ord, eſq. with an original Chartulary of the ſame abbey, and a tranſcript of the Teſta de Nevill.

From the Rev. T. Boſville I have an excellent account of Ulveſcroft priory; and from the Rev. James Naſmith a good epitome of the Regiſter of Ouſton Abbey.

Dr. Bennet, when biſhop of Cork and Roſs[1], with that liberality which marks his character, contributed a plate of the church of St. Nicholas at Leiceſter; and, what is ſtill more acceptable, his lordſhip and the Rev. Thomas Leman have united in favouring me with an account of the Roman roads in Leiceſterſhire, which they had attentively explored. On this ſubject muſt neceſſarily be noticed the friendſhip of the Rev. Thomas Reynolds; and a valuable eſſay on the Roman Milliary at Leiceſter, by the Rev. George Aſhby, who has alſo given me a tranſcript of Mr. Thomas Martin's notes on Burton, with ſeveral pertinent obſervations by himſelf.

[1] His lordſhip has ſince been tranſlated to the biſhoprick of Cloyne.

The late lamented Mr. Southgate, whoſe numiſmatic knowledge is acknowledged, drew up a liſt of the coins minted at Leiceſter, from the reign of Æthelſtan to that of Henry II. illuſtrated by a plate from undoubted originals; which may be conſidered as a ſmall ſpecimen of a work the progreſs of which was retarded only by his diffidence, an elaborate treatiſe on the Saxon coinage, long anxiouſly expected from him.

Dr. Pulteney, who in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, XLIX. 803. gave a ſcientific account of the plants growing in the neighbourhood of Leiceſter, has compiled that liſt anew, with all the advantages which the improved ſtate of botany can afford.

In the ſame elegant and faſhionable ſcience, the Rev. George Crabbe's "Natural Hiſtory of the Vale of Belvoir" is a happy omen of his exertions towards a ſimilar illuſtration of the county.

My friend Mr. Gough allows me only to ſay, that from his incomparable topographical library he has communicated the MS notes in the late Mr. Weſt's copy of Burton; that he has indulged me with ſeveral of his own obſervations on monuments connected with this county, and the unreſerved uſe of them, from the "Sepulchral Monuments of Great Britain;" and, by accompanying ſeveral of my viſitations in Leiceſterſhire, has ſuggeſted hints for improving the deſcription of many of the churches and monuments.

Dr. Pegge, the venerable rector of Whittington, has not withheld his MSS. from my full and free inſpection; and, at the advanced age of ninety, has himſelf given ſome excellent additions.

The Rev. Richard Gifford, of Duffield, Derbyſhire, beſides contributing good engraved portraits of our common relations Mr. and Mrs. Staveley, has taken on himſelf the taſk of tranſlating the Domeſday-Book for this county; whence ~~Mr.~~ Raſpe has deduced ſome valuable tables.

Of the Rev. John Pridden, whoſe diſpoſition to ſerve his friends is well known, more ought to be ſaid, and certainly ſhould be, were he not ſo nearly related to me. I cannot, however, but obſerve that, by his affectionate attention, the fatigue of many a long journey has been agreeably relieved; and that the neatneſs and fidelity of his numerous drawings will appear throughout the work.

Dr. Hurd, the good biſhop of Worceſter (whoſe uniform patronage through life I have happily experienced), has contributed a view of Thurcaſton, the church which for twenty years was honoured by his paſtoral labours; and a portrait of biſhop Latimer, a native of that village.

Dr. Watſon, biſhop of Landaff, has permitted me to inſcribe to him views of the dilapidated church and manſion-houſe of Knaptoft; and of the chapels of Moſeley and Shearſby, appendages to his lordſhip's rectory.

I am happy to have this opportunity to acknowledge the kindneſs of the biſhop of Dromore, who, though not eccleſiaſtically connected with Leiceſterſhire, has, from a natural intereſt in the county as a landholder, contributed a plate of Belgrave and its dependent chapels. Biſhop Percy derives his deſcent from Mr. Cleiveland, vicar of Hinckley, father to the well-known poet. An intermarriage with this family was my firſt inducement to viſit the county of Leiceſter, and by degrees led to the arduous taſk of publiſhing its hiſtory; a taſk which, notwithſtanding all its unforeſeen difficulties, animated by the cordial and reſpectable aſſiſtance that has been given, I have chearfully preſumed to encounter.

Mr. Price and Mr. Gutch have been particularly kind in facilitating my reſearches at Oxford, and in ſuperintending ſome difficult tranſcripts from the old Regiſter of Leiceſter abbey. Similar acknowledgements I owe to the late Dr. Coleman, and to Dr. Wood, at Cambridge; and to the Maſter and Fellows of Caius College, for the loan of a valuable copy of the Viſitation of 1619. Sir Thomas Cave had before tranſcribed the MS notes from a famous copy of Burton[1] in the library of Jeſus

[1] "I have made many additions and alterations from the MS notes of Mr. Gaſcoigne, which he has entered in a printed copy of Mr. Burton's Hiſtory of Leiceſterſhire, now (1767) in the library of Jeſus College in Cambridge, who was a celebrated antiquary and genealogiſt; in which latter ſcience his additions, in giving the collateral branches to the lineal deſcents of many families, are ſo large, that, were they to be printed as he has given them, the work would have enormouſly conſiſted of many large volumes; to avoid which, I have inſerted only ſuch articles where the particular eminence of any collateral deſcendant induced me to tranſmit his memory to poſterity. Of Mr. Gaſcoigne, Mr. Wood, in his Faſti Oxonienſes, vol. II. p. 9. edit. 1721, ſays, "Mr. Richard Gaſcoigne was a Yorkſhire gentleman, much affected to the ſtudy of Antiquity, but eſpecially as to matter of pedigree; and was a great friend to ſir William Dugdale, with whom he firſt contracted an acquaintance about the year 1638." Sir T. CAVE, MS.

Gascoigne

College, in the hand-writing of Mr. Gaſcoigne, who had drawn the greater part of his remarks from Burton's own copy, "which he had in his cuſtody at the beginning of the war, 1640;" and preſented his book to that college in 1700.

To Thomas Aſtle, eſq. keeper of the Records in the Tower, I am indebted for much valuable matter, from the abundant information which his public ſituation and private treaſures enable him, and inclination prompts him, to beſtow.

John Bacon, eſq of the Firſt-Fruits Office, and John Caley, eſq. keeper of the Augmentation Office, have anticipated my intention of ſearching their records, by furniſhing ſpontaneouſly the neceſſary extracts.

The Prerogative Office has furniſhed ſome curious articles. The difficulty of making extracts, where it is not very eaſy for the ſuperintendants to diſtinguiſh between intereſted motives of ſearching and thoſe merely hiſtorical, is well known: yet even here I have met with indulgences which do credit to all the gentlemen who have ſituations in that uſeful and important office.

To the Officers of the College of Arms in general I am much indebted; more eſpecially to Ralph Bigland, eſq. Richmond Herald. In this rich repoſitory is Vincent's copy of the Viſitation of 1619; that of 1683, of which no other copy is ſuppoſed to exiſt; and the original church-notes of William Wyrley[1], about 1591.

To the Curators of the Britiſh Muſeum I am to expreſs my beſt acknowledgements for admiſſion to their archives; and to the ſeveral officers of that magnificent national eſtabliſhment, particularly the Rev. Samuel Ayſcough, for an unwearied attention to my enquiries. In this grand ſtore-houſe of national treaſure, beſides the Viſitations of the County and many other articles to my purpoſe, I found the Regiſter of Burton Lazars, the Chartularies of the Berkeleys and John of Woodford; a continuation of the Monaſticon, in five volumes 4to, purchaſed, with Mr. Peck's MSS, by ſir Thomas Cave, who gave it to the Muſeum; and Peter Le Neve's and Humfrey Wanley's[2] notes on Burton.

John Fardell, eſq. has been as communicative as the inceſſant toils which attend his office of regiſtrar of the church of Lincoln would permit; but I have to lament that want of leiſure has deprived me of ſome of that aſſiſtance, in completing the liſt of incumbents, which his ardent deſire of promoting every work of public utility would otherwiſe, I am confident, have afforded. I am the more obliged to him, however, for what has been done; and, in ſome inſtances, had before received ſimilar favours from his predeceſſor, Mr. Bradley.

Mr. Coltman of Leiceſter has generouſly preſented me with an heraldic MS; and Samuel Lyſons, eſq. has lent me a curious hiſtory of Lindley; both in the hand-writing of Mr. Burton.

The late ſir William Fitzherbert very handſomely entruſted me with a MS volume of records; the Rev. Rogers Ruding, with three others; John Merrick, eſq. with an interleaved copy of Burton, formerly biſhop Kennet's, afterwards ſucceſſively Dr. Vernon's and Dr. Ducarel's; and the Literary Society at Peterborough, with another copy, enriched by the notes of the Rev. Robert Smyth of Woodſton, whoſe tranſcript of ſeveral epitaphs in this and the adjoining counties I had before purchaſed in London.

The information on all hiſtorical ſubjects, which Iſaac Reed, eſq. of Staple-Inn is ſo well able and ſo ready to give, I have ſteadily experienced in this and every publication in which I have been engaged for more than five and twenty years.

The Rev. Aulay Macaulay's "Hiſtory of Claybrook" will be of material ſervice; and his other communications have been numerous.

The Rev. Dr. Ford, in addition to a charming plate of the church at Melton Mowbray, has afforded ſome eſſential literary aid in his own and ſeveral ſurrounding pariſhes.

The Rev. James Douglas has given a view of Coſton, charmingly finiſhed in his happieſt ſtyle of aquatint.

Joſeph Cradock, eſq. of Gumley, has favoured me with a beautiful plate of Bow-bridge, memorable for its traditional connexion with Richard III. after the battle of Boſworth-field; engraved from a drawing taken by the late Mr. Schnebbelie in 1791, a ſhort time before its accidental demolition.

[1] Son of Auguſtine Wyrley, of Nether Seile in this county, where an account of him will be found.

[2] "I took the following writing out of Burton's Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire, gloſſed in ſeveral places by ſome nameleſs gentleman, which I have tranſcribed, and directed you to the page and line in Burton; where you may (if you pleaſe) inſert what I found written in the margin, and here tranſcribed: Prior numerus paginam; ſecundus lineam indicat. HUMFREY WANLEY, Auguſt 3, 1694." Harl. MSS. 6466. p. 10.

The Corporation of Leiceſter, when they perceive the magnitude of my plan, will doubtleſs contribute towards the embelliſhment of ſo copious a Hiſtory of their antient town. The charters, remarkable deeds, and other particulars of their early hiſtory, are among the tranſcripts of Mr. Staveley, Mr. Carte, and Mr. Palmer. To John Herrick, eſq. their late worthy town-clerk, and to T. Pares, jun. eſq. I have many obligations.

The Rev. William Mounſey, whoſe exertions in the Hundred of Framland have been highly uſeful, has my beſt thanks; as have the Rev. G. S. Abbott, the Rev. Dr. Adamthwaite, Thomas Blore, eſq. Mr. Buckley of Thornton, the Rev. Stanley Burrough, the Rev. Charles Burton, the Rev. John Butt, the Rev. John Cleathing, Henry Colman, eſq. the Rev. John Cooper of Stony Staunton, the Rev. John Davenport, the Rev. Samuel Denne, the Rev. J. Goodman, the Rev. John Gregory, the Rev. T. Greſley, John Herrick, eſq. of Beaumanor, the Rev. Thomas Hoe, Mr. Jee of Peckleton, the Rev. Thomas Martyn (Regius Profeſſor of Botany at Cambridge), Henry Maſon, eſq. the Rev. Dr. Orme, the Rev. George Oſborne, the Rev. John Owſley, Samuel Steele Perkins[1], eſq. the Rev. J. Prior, the Rev. Thomas Robinſon, Mr. Rowland Rouſe, the Rev. Stebbing Shaw, jun. the Rev. N. Trotter, the Rev. Edward Williams, the Rev. Dr. Woodcock, and Adam Woolley, junior, eſq. In printing the other Hundreds, this liſt of literary friends will be exceedingly enlarged.

It is no diſparagement to the talents of a very ingenious draughtſman to ſay, that the "Leiceſterſhire Views" and "Excurſions" of Mr. John Throſby are on a plan ſo totally different from that of a regular County Hiſtory, that we ſcarcely interfere. On the contrary, it has conſtantly been my wiſh to aſſiſt his reſearches, and promote the circulation of his pictureſque volumes; and I have experienced from him every grateful and reciprocal return.

Beſides the plates already mentioned, others have been handſomely contributed by William Pochin, eſq. and the honourable Mr. Curzon, members for the county; ſir William Skeffington and ſir William Manners, baronets; the Rev. Henry Green; the Rev. Stephen Greenaway; the Rev. Francis Wilcocks; William Herrick, eſq. of Beaumanor, and John Herrick, eſq. his brother; John Frewen-Turner, eſq.; Mr. George Leigh, &c. &c. Such other plates as the gentlemen of the county may think proper to add to its embelliſhment will be thankfully and regularly acknowledged.

Not to treſpaſs longer on the patience of the reader, it only remains to obſerve, that the HISTORY OF LEICESTERSHIRE unavoidably extends to FOUR Volumes; of which the FIRST contains the various articles of Prolegomena; ſuch as Domeſday, with a Tranſlation; the Teſta de Nevill, and other Records; Liſts of Lord Mayors who have been natives of this county, Baronets, Sheriffs, Members of Parliament, &c.; Diſſertations on the Mint at Leiceſter, the Roman Roads and Milliary, Navigations, Plants, Natural Hiſtory, &c.; with a copy of the Returns made to Parliament, in 1786, in anſwer to the enquiry after charitable benefactions throughout the kingdom, as far as relates to this county, which has been procured at a conſiderable expence, and of which no part has before been printed. In this volume will alſo be placed the antient and modern Hiſtory of the TOWN OF LEICESTER.

The Six Hundreds of the County divide themſelves naturally into the other Three Volumes; and the Hundred of FRAMLAND is now ſubmitted to the publick. The other FIVE Hundreds ſhall be delivered as ſoon as they can be printed; the plates for the whole work being almoſt all engraved. The ſubjects of theſe plates were for the moſt part drawn by Mr. Schnebbelie, the Rev. John Pridden, the Rev. John Griffith, the Rev. Robert Throſby, Mr. James Baſire, Mr. Malcolm, and Mr. Longmate.

With every ſubſequent delivery ſome farther portion of the Introductory Volume will be given; and whatever future additions may be made, the prices now fixed ſhall be religiouſly adhered to, and no money accepted till the delivery of each part.

June 24, 1795. JOHN NICHOLS.

[1] From this gentleman (amongſt many other communications) I had a few notes written in a copy of Burton by Chriſtopher Baſſano, well known among the heralds of the laſt century, and whoſe copy of Wright's Rutland is in my poſſeſſion.

DEDICATION and PREFACE to "The DESCRIPTION of LEICESTERSHIRE; containing Matters of Antiquity, History, Armory, and Genealogy. Written by William Burton, Eſq." and publiſhed in 1622.

To the Illuſtrious and Right Honourable George Villiers, Marquis and Earl of Buckingham, Viſcount Villiers, Baron Whaddon, Lord High Admiral of England, Ireland, and the Principality of Wales; Great Maſter of his Majeſty's Horſe, Knight of the Moſt Noble Order of the Garter, and one of the Lords of his Majeſty's moſt Honourable Privy Council.

My Lord,

HAVING undertaken to remove an Eclipſe from the Sun, without Art or Aſtronomical calculation, to give light to the County of Leicester, whoſe beauty has long been ſhaded and obſcured; I have ventured to ſubmit the work to your Lordſhip's patronage: for, by the brightneſs of thoſe rays, Truth will be diſcovered, againſt which many adverſaries will riſe up; and, becauſe ſhe appears naked and unarmed, and of herſelf unable to reſiſt the violence of their furious encounters; be pleaſed, therefore, my Lord, to grant a protection to her, and to the County, and take them both under your Lordſhip's patronage, ſince by birth they of right belong to you; and no other is equally able to afford a ſecure defence, whoſe word alone can calm the moſt malicious aſſault. Thus will their glorious beams reflect upon yourſelf, and make your merit ſhine with additional luſtre; and, in gratitude for ſo diſtinguiſhed a favour, I ſhall ever remain, with the greateſt reſpect,

My Lord,
Your Lordſhip's
Moſt obedient and devoted humble Servant,
William Burton.

TO THE CANDID READER.

AMONGST the multitude of writers that have preſented themſelves to the view of the publick, I have now ventured myſelf amidſt the crowd, to write upon a ſubject hitherto not treated of by any; not through any ſelf-conceit or vain deſire of glory; for, I am one of thoſe who hold, that

"Gloria totius res vaniſſima mundi."

Not that I entertain ſo high an opinion of my own knowledge or ability, or think myſelf able or fit to handle a ſubject which requires a moſt learned and judicious head to digeſt it in proper order; but ſincerely confeſs myſelf altogether unfit and unfurniſhed for ſo great an undertaking. Unfit, as being confined to another ſtudy, which is jealous, and will admit of no partner; for, all the time that could be poſſibly employed therein was not ſufficient for ſo laborious a ſtudy, by reaſon of the difficulty of acquiring, and the various kinds of learning requiſite therein. Yet, if a partner might be allowed or admitted therein, there is no ſtudy or learning ſo fit and neceſſary for a Lawyer as the ſtudy of Antiquity and Hiſtory, which muſt appear obvious in many reſpects; and, indeed, I was even impelled to the ſtudy of Antiquity by a natural genius, as thoſe two learned writers, Georgius Brunius and Hieronimus Hennings (the one the author of "Theatrum Urbium," the other of "Theatrum Genealogicum[1]") affirm of themſelves, that, though by profeſſion they were Divines, yet, being induced by a natural inclination, the one to the love of pictures, perſpective, maps, and other geographical deſcriptions; the other to the ſtudy of genealogies; therefore no man ſhould caſt any imputation upon them for thoſe their labours; ſeeing that St. Hierom, Bede, Iſidore, Oroſius, Æneas Sylvius, Rodericus Toletanus, and many Fathers of the Church, amuſed themſelves with human learning, and each of them publiſhed Hiſtories, or ſome other treatiſes, expreſſing the variety of their ſtudies therein[1]. The like I may ſay for myſelf; I gave way in ſome meaſure to my own inclination, chuſing rather to recreate myſelf in this way of writing, than either to be miſemployed, or altogether idle; having ever adhered to the truth of that excellent proverb, "Otium ſine literis mors eſt;" contrary to the vain and idle humour of ſome illiterate fops, who hold all Learning baſe, and the lovers thereof equally contemptible; and remembering that old Caſtilian proverb, "Mas vale ſaber que aver," that knowledge is ſuperior to wealth. Unfurniſhed, becauſe, labouring under a weak conſtitution of body, and not being able to make that application which my buſineſs required, I have now retired myſelf to a private country life, and may, with a conceited but ingenious Poet, ſay

"Et quoniam mea ſit quâ ſcribo penna badilus,
"Et faciam druſias foſſa cavando manus[2]."

I am not therefore maſter of ſuch language as the dignity of the ſubject requires, being thereby deſtitute of thoſe helps which the City affords; yet, notwithſtanding, rather than my native country ſhould any longer remain obſcured with darkneſs, I have ventured in a ſmall degree to reſtore it to its proper dignity, being animated thereto by the examples of many judicious and worthy men. As that moſt learned and juſtly-admired Antiquary, William Camden, Eſq. Clarencieux King at Arms, who has compiled a general account of this Iſland; and that induſtrious and very worthy Mr. John Speed, who, in his large and elaborate Hiſtory of England, has given a detail of every Shire; and, by his great travel and expence, has, by way of ornament thereto, added the maps of each Shire, with the plan of every City and great Town inſerted therein, never before performed by any other. And by many more who have illuſtrated ſeveral counties; as that grave and ſage Lawyer William Lambarde, Eſq. of Lincoln's Inn, who from the depth of antiquity has reſtored the county of Kent; that eloquent and noble Gentleman Richard Carew, Eſq. who has very accurately ſurveyed all Cornwall; and that excellent ſurveyor John Norden, Gentleman, who has briefly deſcribed the counties of Middleſex and Hertford; and, ſince that time, has made chorographical tables of ſome Weſtern ſhires, and a fine perſpective of the City of London.

[1] Prefat. in tom. iii. Theatri Urbium Regni, 2, 3, in 4 Monarchiæ parte priori Theatr. Geneal. Epiſt.

[2] Merl. Coccaio, Sonol. 1. de Zantonella.

Being alſo encouraged by many worthy friends, among whom I cannot paſs over unremembered (without acknowledgement,) the kind aſſiſtance and direction of my antient and much-reſpected friend and kinſman John Beaumont, Eſq. of Gracedieu, in the county of Leiceſter; as alſo of that expert genealogiſt, my friend and kinſman Mr. Auguſtine Vincent [1], by his office Rouge-Croix officer at arms; who very kindly, from the Tower, has imparted to me many uſeful notes, not elſewhere to be had or found; whoſe labours alſo in this kind for the county of Northampton ere long will come to light [2].

In this Deſcription I have run through, in every Town (as occaſion offered), the four ſections above mentioned in the title-page. As for the Topography of this county, at the requeſt of a friend of mine, I rectified (ſome years ago) Chriſtopher Saxton's map of this county with an addition of 80 towns; which was engraved at Amſterdam by Jocodos Hodius in 1602, and ſince imitated by M. Speed in his elaborate Hiſtory of Britain, with an enlargement of the plan of the Town of Leiceſter, which is reduced into a leſſer form, and here inſerted; and of thoſe places which are more eminent by their ſituation I have briefly ſpoken ſomething throughout the whole. Where any paſſage naturally offered itſelf to be ſpoken of, I have there a little digreſſed, and written what I conceived proper, not thinking it altogether foreign to my purpoſe to give ſatisfaction to the Reader in this reſpect. And to the end likewiſe that this narration might give ſatisfaction in ſome ſort to each, I have induſtriouſly uſed ſuch hiſtorical digreſſions (where it could be done with propriety) as ſeemed ſuitably connected with the preſent Treatiſe; like unto thoſe artificial cooks and confectioners, who, in ſetting forth a feaſt or banquet, adapt ſeveral diſhes and dainties to different palates. I have remarked, as near as I could aſcertain, the times of the foundation of all Monaſteries, Abbeys, Religious Houſes, Churches, Chapels, Houſes of Nobility, or other memorable places of note, which hereafter may give light to ſome other paſſages. Concerning the titles of land herein expreſſed, where manors, lands, or tenements, did deſcend, or were granted by the king's letters patent, or by any ſuch eminent grant, I have there made bold to ſet down the ſame, which was done for this purpoſe; that the antiquity of the continuance of them in one name or family might be diſcovered, and the antient owner (ſo far as could be found) might be known; not intending to derogate any thing from any man's right or title, or to move any doubts or queſtions touching the ſame. In ſetting down of tenures I have been very cautious, leſt, by being too poſitive, I might be juſtly cenſured. The ſocage-tenure I have deſcribed, but have ſpoke of no other with certainty, being unwilling to give any cauſe of offence; for, I well know there are more differences and more ſtrange proceedings in theſe affairs than in any one thing of ſo common a nature; yet, no doubt, they might be rectified, if the trueſt and moſt probable records and evidences were admitted. Offices and Inquiſitions are very uncertain, ſometimes quite contrary to truth, which are paſſed and concluded with ſuch proofs as for that time are delivered. Thoſe caſes of law, which of later times have happened within the Shire, I have briefly recorded; in ſome, ſhewing the arguments and reaſons of the judgement. As touching the genealogies and arms of the Gentry, I have omitted to ſpeak of the modern, only ſpeaking of the old and antient, whoſe families are now extinct; leſt, perhaps, by not giving to each one now living a due ſatisfaction, I might innocently be blamed; only ſome few of my friends I have remembered, upon whoſe kindneſs I have preſumed that they will accept in good part whatſoever I have delivered.

Reſpecting the ſtate of the Church, I thought proper to ſet it down in the ſame manner as I find it expreſſed in an old manuſcript, made anno 1220, in the fifth year of Henry III. whence may be learned what Churches were Rectories, what were appropriate. If Rectories, who was patron, who the incumbent, what Chapels belonged to them, and how they were to be ſerved: whether by a Chaplain reſident, or on certain days, or ex gratiâ. If appropriate, to what Monaſtery or Religious houſe belonging: and in ſome, how the vicar was endowed, and with what, and to whom the tithes were to be paid. I have farther added out of the Records of the Office of the Auditors of the Preſs, by the means and help of ſir Francis Goſton, knt. one of the Auditors, what value they are now of in the King's books. And farther, I have ſhewn who are now Patrons of every Church.

Concerning the Roman Antiquities, or any other memoirs of Note, I have briefly touched upon all that have come to my knowledge.

Laſtly, I have added the Arms in all the Church-windows in the Shire, and the inſcriptions of the Tombs; which (for the moſt part) I have taken by my own view and travel; with this deſign, that perhaps they may rectify Armories and Genealogies, and may give teſtimony, proof, and alſo terminate many differences. From my own knowledge, I can affirm that the antiquity of a Church-window, for the proof of a match and iſſue had, has been delivered to a Jury at an aſſize, and accepted. I have alſo added the names to moſt of the Coats, for which I had any proof or probable conjecture. If the blazon do not give ſatisfaction, I muſt confeſs, I have not followed that conceited blazon of Gerard Leigh, or others of later times; but have delivered them in ſuch terms as I was beſt acquainted with, and ſuch as are adapted to the capacities of all.

Thus, candid Reader, I have explained my whole intention in the following Treatiſe, and earneſtly requeſt a favourable acceptance of theſe my labours [3] [and well-deſigned endeavours; which (ſuch as they are) I humbly ſubmit myſelf and them to the peruſal and cenſure of the publick.]

From Falde, near Tutbury, co. Stafford, William Burton.

October 30, 1622.

[1] Of whom ſee a particular account in Gent. Mag. vol. LXI. p 312.

[2] In Gaſcoigne's copy this paragraph is thus altered: "And by that painful and true lover of Antiquities John Stowe, who not manie yeares ſince made an accurate Survey of the City of London, ſetting downe the worthyneſſe and ancient and memorable Antiquities of that famous Cittie, imitating therein the labours of Leonecesan Sanſerino, who in that kinde hath excellentlie deſcribed the Citty of Venice."—There probably was ſome decay of friendſhip. Brooke by Vincent came out in 1622, the ſame year as Burton's Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire. G. A.

[3] In Gaſcoigne's copy, tranſcribed from Burton's, all the words in hooks are croſſed out, and theſe ſubſtituted: "Had they been of more worth, the tender would have been otherwiſe."

LEICESTERSHIRE.

The City of Leiceſter, in the time of king Edward, paid yearly to the king thirty pounds by tale (every ore of the value of twenty-pence), and fifteen ſextaries of honey [1].

When the king marched with his army through the land, twelve burgeſſes of that borough attended him. If the king went over ſea againſt the enemy, they ſent four horſes from that borough, as far as London, to carry arms, or ſuch other things as circumſtances required.

At this time king William has, for all rents from that city and county, forty-two pounds and ten ſhillings in weight.

Inſtead of one hawk he has ten pounds by tale; and, inſtead of a baggage or ſumpter horſe, twenty ſhillings [2].

Of the mint-maſters he has yearly twenty pounds, every ore of the value of twenty pence. Of this twenty pounds Hugo de Grentemaiſnil has the third penny.

The king has in Leiceſter thirty-nine houſes.

The archbiſhop of York two houſes with ſac and ſoc; and they belong to Cherlintone.

Earl Hugh has ten houſes, which belong to Barhou, and ſix belonging to Cacheworde, and one houſe belonging to Locteburne.

The abbey of Coventreu has ten houſes.

The abbey of Cruiland has three houſes. From all which the king has his geld.

Hugh de Grentemaiſnil has a hundred and ten houſes and two churches; beſides theſe he has in common with the king twenty-four houſes in the ſame borough. Over and above theſe the ſame Hugh has in Leiceſter twenty-four burgeſſes, who belong to Hanſtigie; and thirteen burgeſſes, who belong to Sigleſbie; and three houſes belonging to Inwareſbie; and ten houſes belonging to Merdegrave; and four houſes belonging to Brohtone; and nine houſes belonging to Stotone; and four houſes belonging to Wichingeſtone; and ſeven houſes belonging to Andreteſbie; and three houſes belonging to Sceltone; and ten houſes belonging to Burſtelle; and three houſes belonging to Burtone; and one houſe belonging to Bruneſtineſtorp; and two houſes belonging to Diresford; and three houſes belonging to Legham, which he bought of Oſbern; and one houſe belonging to Letitone; and one houſe belonging to Turchiteleſtone.

In the ſame borough has the ſame Hugh two churches, and two houſes, and four houſes decayed.

Hugh de Witwile holds of the ſaid Hugh five houſes with ſac and ſoc.

Theſe are in exchange for Wadford.

Robert de Veci has ſix houſes with ſac and ſoc, belonging to Niwetone; and three others with ſac and ſoc, belonging to Chiborne.

Goisfrid de Wirce has one houſe belonging to Dalbi; and another belonging to Pichewelle.

In Leiceſter are four houſes belonging to Scepehefde; and one belonging to Sadintone; and one belonging to Torp.

In the ſame borough Henry de Fereires and Robert the king's ſteward have one burgeſs.

The counteſs Judith has in the ſame borough twenty-eight houſes; and from the moiety of a mill ſhe has five ſhillings and four-pence. Without the borough ſhe has ſix ploughlands belonging to the borough; and ſhe has there one plough, and her homagers [3] three ploughs. There are eight acres of meadow, and a wood ſix furlongs long, and three broad. The whole is worth forty ſhillings.

The wood of the whole ſheriffwick, called Hereſwode, is four miles [4] long and one broad.

I. The Land of the KING. In FRANLAND WAPENT.

The king holds Crohtone. There are twenty-four ploughlands. Two ploughs are in the demeſne and five bondmen; and twenty-two villans, with two bordars, have two ploughs and a half [3]; and thirty ſocmen have eight ploughs. There are thirty acres of meadow, and two mills of eight ſhillings value.

To this manor belongs Cnipetone. There are eight ploughlands and ſix oxgangs. In the demeſne are two ploughs and four bondmen; and ten villans, with four bordars and ten ſocmen, have four ploughs. There are ſix mills of thirteen ſhillings and four-pence value, and thirteen acres of meadow.

To the ſame manor belongs Herſtan. There are twelve ploughlands. Twenty ſocmen, with five villans and one bordar, have here ſix ploughs and a half. There are ſeventeen acres of meadow. The whole was valued at ten pounds; now it is worth ſeventeen pounds.

The king holds Broctone. There are twelve ploughlands. One plough is in the demeſne; and twenty-four ſocmen, with nine villans and four bordars, have twelve ploughs. There are a hundred acres of meadow. It was valued at three pounds; it is now at eight pounds. Earl Morcar held theſe two manors. They are now held by Hugh, the ſon of Baldwin, who farms them under the king.

The king holds Rodolei. King Edward held it. There are five ploughlands; two of theſe are in the demeſne, and there are two ploughs; and twenty-nine villans, with one prieſt and eighteen bordars, have ſix ploughs. There is a mill of four ſhillings value; and there are thirty-ſeven acres of meadow. The demeſne wood is a mile long, and half one broad. The wood of the villans is four furlongs long and three broad. This manor is worth ſixty-two ſhillings; and to it belong the following members.

[1] This name afterwards occurs "Buci."

[2] Afterwards 'Renbudcurt,' and 'Reinbudcurt.'

[3] That is, they had arable land ſufficient to employ two ploughs, and half enough to employ a third. See the Diſſertation.

To Wetberge belongs one ploughland and a half in Burg; and there is one plough with one villan.

In Torp are five ploughlands. There ſixteen villans, with three ſocmen and eight bordars, have ſix ploughs. There are thirty acres of meadow. It was valued at three pounds; it is now at ſeven pounds.

In Diſlea is one hide. There ſixteen villans and ſixteen ſocmen, with one bordar, have eight ploughs. Two mills pay five ſhillings, and there are ten acres of meadow. There is a wood four furlongs long, and as much broad. It lay waſte; now it is worth forty ſhillings. Theſe lands Queen Edid held. Now Godvin farms them of the king. But Diſlea is held of the King in fee.

The ſame Godvin holds of the King in fee two hides and a half in Scepeſhefde, and four ploughlands; Oſgot held them with ſac and ſoc. He has two ploughlands in demeſne and two bondmen; and thirty villans with twelve bordars have fifteen ploughs; and twenty ſocmen, with two knights, and ſix villans, and four bordars, have twenty-one ploughs. There is a mill of five ſhillings value; there are fifty acres of meadow, and a wood a mile long, and four furlongs broad. He found this land lying waſte. Out of this land ſix pounds are paid, by order of the Biſhop of Baieux, for the ſervice of the Iſle of With.

In Noſſitone are three ploughlands belonging to the ſoc of Ochebam. There ſeventeen ſocmen, with ſix bordars, have ſix ploughs; and there is a wood, one furlong long, and half one broad. It is worth twenty ſhillings. The King has it in demeſne.

The abbey of Cruiland holds two ploughlands in Sutone, and two ploughlands in Stapletone. The land is equal to five ploughs. There ſix villans, with two bordars, have one plough and a half. It was valued at twenty-four ſhillings; it is now at twenty ſhillings.

The ſame abbey holds ten ploughlands and a half in Bebi. The land is equal to ſeven ploughs[3]; one is in the demeſne, and two bondmen; and twenty-one villans, with five ſocmen and three bordars, have ſix ploughs. There are thirty acres of meadow. It was valued at ſixty ſhillings; it is now at forty.

VIII. The KING's Elemoſynary Lands.

Godvin, a prieſt, holds of the king half a ploughland in Petlinge; and he has there half a plough, and one acre and half of meadow. It was, and is, worth five ſhillings.

The wife of Quintin holds of the king two ploughlands in Sveſbi, and other two in Suton. In theſe ſhe has two bordars. The land is equal to two ploughs. It was valued at fifteen ſhillings; it is now at three ſhillings.

Ingald holds of the king two ploughlands and one yardland in Elveſtone. He has there one plough; and two villans, with one ſocman, have half a plough. It was valued at ten ſhillings; it is now at five ſhillings.

Ernebern, a prieſt, holds of the king two ploughlands and a half in Svinford; and he has there one plough with two bordars, and three acres of meadow. It is worth five ſhillings.

Aluric, a prieſt, holds of the king in Wiceſtan two ploughlands that belong to Sceneford. He has there one plough; and five bordars of his have another. There are four acres of meadow. It was, and is, worth twenty ſhillings.

[2] “This manor (long before the Conqueſt) was antient demeſne, as it appeareth by the Book of Domeſday, and is there called Beryall.” Burton's Leiceſterſhire, p. 33. It appears from this paſſage that Burton never ſaw Domeſday-Book.

[3] Ingulphus, who has given us, p. 909, a tranſcript from Domeſday-Book, is not in this inſtance very exact. Item, in Leiſterſhire, in Goſcote Warp, in Bebi Sanctus Guthlacus habuit & habet decem carucatas terræ & dimidiam; terra eſt octo carucat. in dominio eſt una carucat. & duo ſervi, & 21 villani cum quinque ſockm. & tres bordarii habent 6 carucatas: ibi 30 acræ prati. Valent tempore regis Edwardi 60 ſolidis, modo 40 ſolidis. But this variation may be accounted for, by the inaccuracy of a tranſcriber writing VIII for VII.

[4] That the commiſſioners employed in this ſurvey, and their clerks, were Normans, would have appeared highly probable, if we had no authority for aſſerting they were ſo. But all the names of places that end in worth are an undeniable proof of it. The Normans were at that time as incapable of pronouncing the Saxon ð as they are at this day; and were neceſſitated to make a d of it.

XXIX. The Land of GOISFRID DE WIRCE.

Gosfrid de Wirce holds of the king three ploughlands in Stantone. In the time of king Edward there were four ploughs. One plough is in the demeſne; and thirteen villans, with five bordars, have three ploughs. There is a wood a mile long and half a mile broad. It was, and is, worth twenty ſhillings. King William gave this land to Goisfrid in exchange for the manor called Turchileſtone; and the following likewiſe.

The ſame Goisfrid holds four ploughlands and a half in Nortone. In the time of king Edward there were three ploughs. In the demeſne is one plough and a half; and three villans, with one ſocman and one bordar, have one plough. There is a mill of two ſhillings value; and there are three acres of meadow and three acres of wood. It was, and is, worth ten ſhillings. Alwin and Vlf hold it freely. In FRANELUND WAP.

The ſame Goisfrid holds Medeltone. There are ſeven hides, and one ploughland, and one oxgang. In every hide are fourteen ploughlands and a half. In the demeſne are four ploughs and four bondmen; and twenty villans, with two prieſts and fourteen bordars, have ſix ploughs and a half. The market yields twenty ſhillings; and two mills twenty-five ſhillings. There are twenty acres of meadow; and a wood one furlong long and one broad. It was valued at a hundred ſhillings; it is now at eight pounds. To this manor belong theſe members:

In Fredebi are ten ploughlands, and thirty acres of meadow.

In Wordebi is one ploughland and a half and half an oxgang, and ſix acres of meadow.

In Burtone are twelve ploughlands, all but one oxgang; and twelve acres of meadow.

In Chitebie are eight ploughlands; and ſix acres of meadow.

In Chirchebi are ſeventeen ploughlands.

In Siſtenebi are two ploughlands and a half.

In Eſtewelle are ſix ploughlands and ten acres of meadow.

In Goutebi are ſix ploughlands and twenty acres of meadow.

In the time of king Edward there were forty-eight ploughs in theſe lands. Now there are there a hundred ſocmen, with ten villans and thirteen bordars, who have forty-three ploughs.

The whole was valued at four pounds ten ſhillings when they entered upon it; it is now at fifteen pounds and ten ſhillings.

This land Leuric, the ſon of Leuin, held in the time of king Edward, with ſac and ſoc.

XLIII. The Land of Earl Hugo.

In Gutlacistan Wap.

Earl Hugo holds Barhow of the king. There are fifteen ploughlands. In the demeſne he has four ploughs and a half, and two bondmen with one bondwoman; and forty villans, with thirteen bordars, have eleven ploughs. There are three mills of thirty ſhillings value; and a wood one mile long and four furlongs broad, which yields five ſhillings. This manor earl Herald held, with the under written appendages.

In Dunintone five ploughlands, and a meadow three furlongs long and one broad.

In Coſintone ſix ploughlands. In Hohtone ſix ploughlands.

In Setgrave two ploughlands and ten acres of meadow. In Seglebi one plougland.

In Redreſbi two ploughlands, all but one oxgang, and eight acres of meadow.

In Brocheſbi two ploughlands, ſeven acres of meadow, and a mill of five ſhillings value.

In Friſebi one ploughland and a half, and four acres of meadow.

In Preſtwald two ploughlands, a meadow three furlongs long and one broad, and a wood ſix furlongs long and five broad.

In Cernelega four ploughlands. It lies waſte. The value is unknown.

In Gadeſbi one ploughland, four acres of meadow, and a mill of three ſhillings value.

In Redebi three ploughlands, all but two oxgangs, and three acres of meadow.

In Friſebi one ploughland and a half, four acres of meadow, and a mill of twenty-eight pence value.

Of theſe lands four of the earl's knights hold twelve ploughlands. In theſe the earl himſelf hath four ploughs and a half in the demeſne, and thirty ſocmen, and twenty-five villans, and thirteen bordars, who have fifteen ploughs and a half with one bondman.

His knights have in the demeſne three ploughs and twelve villans, with one ſocman and two bordars, who have three ploughs.

In Lucteburne Roger holds of the earl eight ploughlands; Ralph three ploughlands and a half; Hugo three ploughlands and a half; Godric three ploughlands and a half; Roger half a ploughland. In the demeſne are five ploughs; and eight villans, with fifteen ſocmen and ſixteen bordars, have twelve ploughs and a half. There are two mills of ten ſhillings value, and forty-five acres of meadow, and a wood ſeven furlongs long, and three broad. Five Thanes held it freely.

Lewin holds of the earl one hide in Burtone. The ſoc belongs to Lucteburne. One plough is in the demeſne, and one villan with two bordars; and there are twenty acres of meadow.

In the ſame manor Godric holds of the earl two ploughlands; and he has there one plough in the demeſne, and twenty acres of meadow. Hugo de Grentemaiſnil claims the ſoc of this land.

Roger holds of the earl five ploughlands in Tedingeſworde. He has there one plough in the demeſne; and four villans with four bordars have two ploughs. There is a mill of ſixpence value, and there are ſix acres of meadow. This land is now in diſpute with the king. Earl Herald held it.

Robert holds of earl Hugo fifteen ploughlands in Cogeworde. He has there five ploughs in the demeſne, with one bondman and two bondwomen; and twenty-five villans, with thirteen bordars, have ten ploughs. Earl Herald held it.

To this manor belong three ploughlands in Avederne and in Dexleia. There are twenty acres of meadow, and a wood one furlong and a half long and one broad.

In all theſe lands before-mentioned were eighty ploughs in the time of king Edward. The whole was, and is, worth forty pounds. When the earl entered upon it, it was valued at ten pounds.

Hugh holds of the earl two ploughlands, all but one oxgang, in Bortone. It lies waſte. This is reckoned with the above.

Roger Buſli holds of earl Hugo in . . . Here is half a plough . . . . . and four villans, with two bordars . . . . . half. Alnod held it.

Robert, ſon of William Uſher, holds of the king two ploughlands in Howes. He has there one plough in the demeſne and three bondmen; and eight villans, with one bordar, have two ploughs. There are ſeven acres of meadow. It was, and is, worth twenty ſhillings.

Turſtin holds of Robert two ploughlands and a half in Howes. He has there one plough, and two bondmen, and ſix villans, and two bordars, with one plough and a half. There are nine acres of meadow. It was, and is, worth twenty ſhillings.

The ſame Turſtin holds of Robert four ploughlands in Clacheſtone, and Tetbald two ploughlands. One plough is there in the demeſne; and three ſocmen, and five villans, and four bordars, with three ploughs and one bondman. There are fourteen acres of meadow. The whole was, and is, worth twenty ſhillings. Outi and Arnui held theſe lands, with ſac and ſoe, in the time of king Edward.

XLIV. The Land of the Homagers of the Earl of MELLENT.

In GUTLACISTAN WAP.

Of the earl of Mellent Turald holds the land of four villans, and he has there in the demeſne land equal to one plough, and five ſocmen, with one villan and two bordars, who have two ploughs. There are five acres of meadow. It is worth twenty ſhillings. This land lies in Aileſton.

Ulnod holds of the earl four ploughlands belonging to Aileſtone. In the demeſne he has one plough; and two villans, with three bordars, have one plough. There are two acres of bruſhwood, of which William Pevrel has the ſoc and two-pence a-year. The whole is worth ten ſhillings. Lewin held it in the time of king Edward.

William holds of the earl half a hide and one ploughland and a half in Bladi. There were nine ploughs. Now in the demeſne is one plough with one bondman; and twenty-eight ſocmen and four villans, with four bordars, have ſix ploughs. There is a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are thirty acres of meadow. It was valued at thirty ſhillings; it is now at fifty ſhillings. Bricman and Ulf held it.

Ralph holds Weſtham of the earl. There is half a hide and one ploughland. There were ſix ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two ploughs and two bondmen; and twenty-four ſocmen and eleven villans, with five bordars, have five ploughs. There is one knight, and a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are ſixteen acres of meadow. It was valued at twenty-five ſhillings; it is now at ſixty ſhillings.

Robert holds of the earl four ploughlands and a half in Petlinge. There was one plough. Three ſocmen have there half a plough. There are ten acres of meadow. It was valued at four ſhillings; it is now at five ſhillings. Oſmar held it freely.

The ſame holds of the earl Brandineſtor. There are two parts of one hide, that is, twelve ploughlands. There were ſix ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two ploughs and two bondmen; and nine ſocmen and three villans, with ſix bordars, have three ploughs. There are ſixteen acres of meadow. Of this land Oſbern holds three ploughlands, and he has there one plough. It was valued at thirty ſhillings; it is now at forty ſhillings. Boui held it freely.

Fulco holds of the earl eight ploughlands in Claibroc. There were nine ploughs. One plough is now in the demeſne and two bondmen; and nine ſocmen, and nine villans, and two knights, with ſix bordars, have five ploughs. It was valued at ten ſhillings; it is now at fifty-five ſhillings.

Robert holds of the earl Sawelle. There are nine ploughlands. There were ſeven ploughs and ſix bondmen; and twenty-three villans, with eleven bordars, have ſix ploughs. There is a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are ſixty acres of meadow. It was valued at forty ſhillings; it is now at ſixty ſhillings. Saxi held it freely in the time of king Edward.

Robert holds of the earl four ploughlands in Plotelei. There were four ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two ploughs and two bondmen; and four villans, with one bordar, have one plough. There are two acres of meadow. It was valued at ten ſhillings; it is now at thirty ſhillings. Leuric held it.

Ralph holds of the earl nine ploughlands in Bageworde. There were ſeven ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two, with one bondman; and twenty-four villans and three ſocmen, with ſeven bordars, have five ploughs. There is a wood a mile long and half one broad. It was valued at forty ſhillings; it is now at four pounds. Saxi held it freely.

Ingenulf holds of the earl ſix ploughlands in Ibeſtoche. There were four ploughs. Now in the demeſne is one plough; and ten ſocmen, with eleven bordars, have three ploughs. It was valued at five ſhillings; it is now at forty ſhillings. The ſoc belongs to Bageworde.

Ralph holds of the earl two ploughlands and a half in Chiveleſworde. There were two ploughs. There is one now in the demeſne, with one bondman; and two villans, with five bordars, have one plough. There are eight acres of meadow. It was, and is, worth twenty ſhillings. Ulchetel held it freely.

The ſame holds of the earl ..... plouglands and two oxgangs in the ſame manor. There was half a plough; and as much is now in the demeſne, with one ſocman, and two bordars, and one bondwoman. There is a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are four acres of meadow. It was valued at two ſhillings; it is now at ten ſhillings. The ſame Ulchetel held it.

A DISSERTATION ON DOMESDAY-BOOK.

> "Are we concerned to know the manners and cuſtoms which were in uſe amongſt the Grecians and Romans many ages ago, and not concerned to know the cuſtoms and manners of our own anceſtors at a far leſs diſtance of time? Do we think it beneficial to be verſed in the hiſtory, both ancient and modern, of foreign nations; and are we at the ſame time content to deſpiſe or neglect the ancient hiſtory of our own?"
> MADOX, Pref. Ep. to Hiſtory of the Exchequer.

DOMESDAY-BOOK, the moſt antient and valuable record that exiſts in the archives of this or any other kingdom, takes its name from Dom, i. e. cenſus, æſtimatio, and Boc, book; quaſi Liber Judicii, the regiſter from which the value of eſtates might be aſcertained, and ſentence and judgement might be given as to the tenure of them. The addition of dey or day does not augment, but only confirms the ſenſe, ſignifying not only the meaſure of time, but the adminiſtration of juſtice[1]. It ſtill continues in ſo great credit, that if a queſtion ariſes at this day, whether a manor, pariſh, or lands, be antient demeſne, the iſſue muſt be tried by this book, whence there is no appeal, nor is any averment to be made againſt it. To its authority even the Conqueror[2] himſelf ſubmitted in caſes wherein he was concerned. If the land in queſtion be found under the title of Terra Regis, it is and ought to be judged antient demeſne; and, on the other hand, if it be ſet down under the name of ſome private lord or ſubject, it is determined not to have been the king's[3]. And at this day, what manor is antient demeſne, and what not, is determinable by Domeſday alone.

The author of the Dialogus de Scaccario[4] ſays, the Survey was called Domeſday by the Engliſh, becauſe a ſentence, ariſing from the evidence there contained, admitted neither of appeal nor evaſion, any more than the final doom at the day of judgement.

An inſtance however occurs, ſo early as 1377, in the firſt year of the reign of king Richard the Second, in which the Commons of England at large remonſtrate to the king and the great council of the nation againſt ſome irregular practices that had crept into uſe from a perverſion of the privileges enjoyed under the ſanction of this record[5].

Our anceſtors had many Dome-books. A ſurvey of this kind had been taken before by Alfred[6], who about the year 893, as Ingulphus[7] and other hiſtorians tell us, divided England into counties[8], hundreds, and tithings[9]. Previous to this he took a ſurvey of

[1] Gloſſary to Kennet's Parochial Antiquities, in voce.

We ſee the Dome Bôc often referred to in the laws of the Saxon kings, as a book of laws, or ſtatute-book; and king Edward the Elder commands all his judges to give right judgements to all the people of England, to the beſt of their ſkill and underſtanding, as it ſtands in the Dome Bôc, or book of laws, "ut in judiciali libro ſcriptum habetur;" Lambarde. And the word Domas plainly ſignifies Laws, in the preamble to the laws of Ina. Whence we may fairly ſuppoſe, that the word Dome, in William the Firſt's time, meant Law. We are certain it had much the ſame ſignification ſome centuries after; for we read in Lydgate, Hiſtorie of the Deſtruction of the Citie of Thebes, 2d part,

——In a porche, bilte of ſquare ſtones,
Full mightily in arched environ,
Where the domes and pleas of the town
Were executed, and laws of the king, &c.

And we are told by Fabian, vol. II. p. 1. ed. 1559, that the citizens of London had formerly an old regiſter, wherein were recorded the names of the portreeves, together with the laws and cuſtoms of that city, which in the Saxon tongue was called Domeſday. That the word day formerly ſignified judgement, determination, as it does at preſent all over Germany, we may farther prove from Spenſer's Fairy Queen, B. II. C. VIII. 28.

——What art thou
That mak'ſt thyſelf his dayeſman to prolong
The vengeance preſt?

We find the word uſed in the ſame ſenſe in our verſion of the book of Job, ix. 33. "Neither is there any dayeſman betwixt us, that might lay his hand on us both." The word is likewiſe to be found in archbiſhop Cranmer's tranſlation. It is even uſed in a ſimilar manner in Burton's Anatomie of Melancholie, 2d edit. p. 4. "They had wont heretofore, ſaith Auſtin, to end matters per communes arbitros; and ſo in Switzerland, we are informed by Simlerus, they had ſome common arbitrator or dayeſman, in every town, that made a friendly compoſition betwixt man and man; and he much wonders at their honeſt ſimplicity, that could keep peace ſo well, and end ſuch great cauſes by that means."

[2] On this appellation, here uſed in conformity to general uſage, ſee an excellent remark in p. l.

[3] Hobart's Reports, f. 188. Dialog. de Scaccario, l. i. c. 16. p. 30, 31, publiſhed by Mr. Madox. Webb on Domeſday-Book, p. 7. Chauncey ſays, for a long time after this ſurvey none were permitted to make any claim or title to lands beyond the Conqueſt. Hertfordſhire, p. 9. When the evidence is by Domeſday, the barons of the Exchequer, on proper writs being directed to them from the court before whom the trial is to be had, return thither that part of Domeſday which concerns the matter in queſtion, atteſted by proper officers; which record alone determines the ſuit.

[8] "The diviſion of the kingdom into parts, muſt be coeval with the eſtabliſhment of a regular government throughout the whole kingdom, or the provinces into which it was divided under the Heptarchy. As the latter was more perfect, the former would be more accurate. Alfred then was not the firſt who divided England into diſtricts or counties, mention being made of ſuch diviſion in the laws of Ina and in other places. He only revived what had been done before, making many alterations and improvements, and cauſing a general ſurvey of his dominions to be taken in what is called the Roll of Winchester, perhaps from its being kept in the monaſtery of his foundation there, or from his making that city his favourite reſidence. XLIV. The Land of the Homagers of the Earl of MELLENT.

In GUTLACISTAN WAP.

Of the earl of Mellent Turald holds the land of four villans, and he has there in the demeſne land equal to one plough, and five ſocmen, with one villan and two bordars, who have two ploughs. There are five acres of meadow. It is worth twenty ſhillings. This land lies in Aileſton.

Ulnod holds of the earl four ploughlands belonging to Aileſtone. In the demeſne he has one plough; and two villans, with three bordars, have one plough. There are two acres of bruſhwood, of which William Pevrel has the ſoc and two-pence a-year. The whole is worth ten ſhillings. Lewin held it in the time of king Edward.

William holds of the earl half a hide and one ploughland and a half in Bladi. There were nine ploughs. Now in the demeſne is one plough with one bondman; and twenty-eight ſocmen and four villans, with four bordars, have ſix ploughs. There is a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are thirty acres of meadow. It was valued at thirty ſhillings; it is now at fifty ſhillings. Bricman and Ulf held it.

Ralph holds Weſtham of the earl. There is half a hide and one ploughland. There were ſix ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two ploughs and two bondmen; and twenty-four ſocmen and eleven villans, with five bordars, have five ploughs. There is one knight, and a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are ſixteen acres of meadow. It was valued at twenty-five ſhillings; it is now at ſixty ſhillings.

Robert holds of the earl four ploughlands and a half in Petlinge. There was one plough. Three ſocmen have there half a plough. There are ten acres of meadow. It was valued at four ſhillings; it is now at five ſhillings. Oſmar held it freely.

The ſame holds of the earl Brandineſtor. There are two parts of one hide, that is, twelve ploughlands. There were ſix ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two ploughs and two bondmen; and nine ſocmen and three villans, with ſix bordars, have three ploughs. There are ſixteen acres of meadow. Of this land Oſbern holds three ploughlands, and he has there one plough. It was valued at thirty ſhillings; it is now at forty ſhillings. Boui held it freely.

Fulco holds of the earl eight ploughlands in Claibroc. There were nine ploughs. One plough is now in the demeſne and two bondmen; and nine ſocmen, and nine villans, and two knights, with ſix bordars, have five ploughs. It was valued at ten ſhillings; it is now at fifty-five ſhillings.

Robert holds of the earl Sawelle. There are nine ploughlands. There were ſeven ploughs and ſix bondmen; and twenty-three villans, with eleven bordars, have ſix ploughs. There is a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are ſixty acres of meadow. It was valued at forty ſhillings; it is now at ſixty ſhillings. Saxi held it freely in the time of king Edward.

Robert holds of the earl four ploughlands in Plotelei. There were four ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two ploughs and two bondmen; and four villans, with one bordar, have one plough. There are two acres of meadow. It was valued at ten ſhillings; it is now at thirty ſhillings. Leuric held it.

Ralph holds of the earl nine ploughlands in Bageworde. There were ſeven ploughs. Now in the demeſne are two, with one bondman; and twenty-four villans and three ſocmen, with ſeven bordars, have five ploughs. There is a wood a mile long and half one broad. It was valued at forty ſhillings; it is now at four pounds. Saxi held it freely.

Ingenulf holds of the earl ſix ploughlands in Ibeſtoche. There were four ploughs. Now in the demeſne is one plough; and ten ſocmen, with eleven bordars, have three ploughs. It was valued at five ſhillings; it is now at forty ſhillings. The ſoc belongs to Bageworde.

Ralph holds of the earl two ploughlands and a half in Chiveleſworde. There were two ploughs. There is one now in the demeſne, with one bondman; and two villans, with five bordars, have one plough. There are eight acres of meadow. It was, and is, worth twenty ſhillings. Ulchetel held it freely.

The ſame holds of the earl ..... plouglands and two oxgangs in the ſame manor. There was half a plough; and as much is now in the demeſne, with one ſocman, and two bordars, and one bondwoman. There is a mill of two ſhillings value, and there are four acres of meadow. It was valued at two ſhillings; it is now at ten ſhillings. The ſame Ulchetel held it.

A DIS-

A DISSERTATION ON DOMESDAY-BOOK.

> "Are we concerned to know the manners and cuſtoms which were in uſe amongſt the Grecians and Romans many ages ago, and not concerned to know the cuſtoms and manners of our own anceſtors at a far leſs diſtance of time? Do we think it beneficial to be verſed in the hiſtory, both ancient and modern, of foreign nations; and are we at the ſame time content to deſpiſe or neglect the ancient hiſtory of our own?" MADOX, Pref. Ep. to Hiſtory of the Exchequer.

DOMESDAY-BOOK, the moſt antient and valuable record that exiſts in the archives of this or any other kingdom, takes its name from Dom, i. e. cenſus, æſtimatio, and Boc, book; quaſi Liber Judicii, the regiſter from which the value of eſtates might be aſcertained, and ſentence and judgement might be given as to the tenure of them. The addition of dey or day does not augment, but only confirms the ſenſe, ſignifying not only the meaſure of time, but the adminiſtration of juſtice[1]. It ſtill continues in ſo great credit, that if a queſtion ariſes at this day, whether a manor, pariſh, or lands, be antient demeſne, the iſſue muſt be tried by this book, whence there is no appeal, nor is any averment to be made againſt it. To its authority even the Conqueror[2] himſelf ſubmitted in caſes wherein he was concerned. If the land in queſtion be found under the title of Terra Regis, it is and ought to be judged antient demeſne; and, on the other hand, if it be ſet down under the name of ſome private lord or ſubject, it is determined not to have been the king's[3]. And at this day, what manor is antient demeſne, and what not, is determinable by Domeſday alone.

The author of the Dialogus de Scaccario[4] ſays, the Survey was called Domeſday by the Engliſh, becauſe a ſentence, ariſing from the evidence there contained, admitted neither of appeal nor evaſion, any more than the final doom at the day of judgement.

An inſtance however occurs, ſo early as 1377, in the firſt year of the reign of king Richard the Second, in which the Commons of England at large remonſtrate to the king and the great council of the nation againſt ſome irregular practices that had crept into uſe from a perverſion of the privileges enjoyed under the ſanction of this record[5].

Our anceſtors had many Dome-books. A ſurvey of this kind had been taken before by Alfred[6], who about the year 893, as Ingulphus[7] and other hiſtorians tell us, divided England into counties[8], hundreds, and tithings[9]. Previous to this he took a ſurvey of all the manors and hides in his dominions, which was digeſted into a regiſter, called Domboc, q. d. the judgement-book, and depoſited among the archives of the church of Wincheſter, the reſidence of the Weſt Saxon kings; whence it is alſo called the Wincheſter book[1], and Rotulus Winton. This Domeboc of Alfred ſeems to have been uſed by ſucceeding princes, eſpecially when Danegeld was impoſed by Edward the Confeſſor, whoſe ſurvey is often referred to in Domeſday-Book[2]. It was perhaps the model of the Conqueror's, as it could not but be extant in his time; at which period "the whole lands of England, excluſive of thoſe of the church, were poſſeſſed by 700 immediate vaſſals of the crown, &c.; and as all who held of the king in capite ſat in parliament, the nation was at that time repreſented by a body as numerous as at preſent, and by the proprietors of almoſt the whole land in the kingdom, if one can apply the word repreſentation to men who ſat in parliament, not as repreſenting others, an idea at that time unknown, but in their own right, not to protect the people againſt ſlavery, but to preſerve themſelves againſt tyranny[3]."

[1] Gloſſary to Kennet's Parochial Antiquities, in voce.

We ſee the Dome Bôc often referred to in the laws of the Saxon kings, as a book of laws, or ſtatute-book; and king Edward the Elder commands all his judges to give right judgements to all the people of England, to the beſt of their ſkill and underſtanding, as it ſtands in the Dome Bôc, or book of laws, "ut in judiciali libro ſcriptum habetur;" Lambarde. And the word Domas plainly ſignifies Laws, in the preamble to the laws of Ina. Whence we may fairly ſuppoſe, that the word Dome, in William the Firſt's time, meant Law. We are certain it had much the ſame ſignification ſome centuries after; for we read in Lydgate, Hiſtorie of the Deſtruction of the Citie of Thebes, 2d part,

——In a porche, bilte of ſquare ſtones,
Full mightily in arched environ,
Where the domes and pleas of the town
Were executed, and laws of the king, &c.

And we are told by Fabian, vol. II. p. 1. ed. 1559, that the citizens of London had formerly an old regiſter, wherein were recorded the names of the portreeves, together with the laws and cuſtoms of that city, which in the Saxon tongue was called Domeſday. That the word day formerly ſignified judgement, determination, as it does at preſent all over Germany, we may farther prove from Spenſer's Fairy Queen, B. II. C. VIII. 28.

——What art thou
That mak'ſt thyſelf his dayeſman to prolong
The vengeance preſt?

We find the word uſed in the ſame ſenſe in our verſion of the book of Job, ix. 33. "Neither is there any dayeſman betwixt us, that might lay his hand on us both." The word is likewiſe to be found in archbiſhop Cranmer's tranſlation. It is even uſed in a ſimilar manner in Burton's Anatomie of Melancholie, 2d edit. p. 4. "They had wont heretofore, ſaith Auſtin, to end matters per communes arbitros; and ſo in Switzerland, we are informed by Simlerus, they had ſome common arbitrator or dayeſman, in every town, that made a friendly compoſition betwixt man and man; and he much wonders at their honeſt ſimplicity, that could keep peace ſo well, and end ſuch great cauſes by that means."

[3] Hobart's Reports, f. 188. Dialog. de Scaccario, l. i. c. 16. p. 30, 31, publiſhed by Mr. Madox. Webb on Domeſday-Book, p. 7. Chauncey ſays, for a long time after this ſurvey none were permitted to make any claim or title to lands beyond the Conqueſt. Hertfordſhire, p. 9. When the evidence is by Domeſday, the barons of the Exchequer, on proper writs being directed to them from the court before whom the trial is to be had, return thither that part of Domeſday which concerns the matter in queſtion, atteſted by proper officers; which record alone determines the ſuit.

[8] "The diviſion of the kingdom into parts, muſt be coeval with the eſtabliſhment of a regular government throughout the whole kingdom, or the provinces into which it was divided under the Heptarchy. As the latter was more perfect, the former would be more accurate. Alfred then was not the firſt who divided England into diſtricts or counties, mention being made of ſuch diviſion in the laws of Ina and in other places. He only revived what had been done before, making many alterations and improvements, and cauſing a general ſurvey of his dominions to be taken in what is called the Roll of Wincheſter, perhaps from its being kept in the monaſtery of his foundation there, or from his making that city his favourite reſidence. This ſurvey being loſt, or, by the change of diviſions, tenures, or property, ſuperſeded, William the Conqueror made a ſecond very accurate ſurvey." Dr. Naſh, Obſervations on Domeſday, p. 1.

[9] Of the diviſion of England into pariſhes, about the year 636, ſee under Abkettleby, p. 16.

The following lines of Robert of Glouceſter contain, perhaps, the oldeſt deſcription of Domeſday-book:

"The king Wyllam vor to wyte the wurth of lond,
Let enquiry ſtreythlyche thorou al Engelond,
Hou mony plou lond, and hou mony hyden al ſo,
Were in everyche ſhyre, and wat hii were wurth therto.
And rentys of ech toun, and the wateres eſchone
That wurth, and of wodes ek, that ther ne bylevede none,
That he wuſte wat hii were worth, and ſo underſtonde
And wyte al clene y nou, and that wryt dude ywys
In the treſorye at Weſtmynſtre, there as yt gut ys.
So that oure kynges ſuththe wanne hii ranſom toke,
Iredy wat folc mygte gyve hii founde ther in her boke."

The four laſt lines are thus read in another MS. in the Heralds College:

"And lete hit write in a boke, and dude the boke i wys
In the treſoury of Weſtmynſtre as hit put ther is.
So that other kynges ſuthe taillage whanne they toke
Hii founde what folke myght yeve redy in thuſke boke."

The deſign of the book was, to ſerve as a regiſter; by which ſentence was to be given in the tenures of eſtates. This is ſummed up in theſe verſes:

"Quid deberetur fiſco, quæ, quanta tributa,
Nomine quid cenſus, quæ vectigalia, quantum
Quiſque teneretur feodali ſolvere jure,
Qui ſint exempti, vel quos angaria damnet,
Qui ſint vel glebæ ſervi, vel conditionis,
Quove manumiſſus patrono jure ligetur[4]."

The ſurvey was executed by Norman commiſſioners[5], nobility, and biſhops, appointed by the king, who were empowered to enquire upon view, and upon the oath of a jury ſummoned and impanneled in each hundred out of all orders of freemen, from barons down to the loweſt farmers, to give in upon oath to the commiſſioners, by verdict or preſentment, due information, for the faithful and impartial execution of it. The number of jurors in each county differed according to its extent. In ſome, as Selden ſays[6], it did not exceed eight or nine; in others more.

The following paſſage, cited by ſir William Dugdale[7] from the Leidger-book of Worceſter, in the Cotton Library, illuſtrates the mode in which the returns were made:

"In vicecomitatu Wiraceaſtre habet S. Maria de Wiraceaſtre unum hundredum, quod vocatur Oſvaldeſlau, in quo jacent 300 hidæ, &c. Hoc teſtimonium totus vicecomitatus Wiraceaſtre, dato ſacramento jusjurandi, firmavit, exhortante et adlaborante piiſſimo & prudentiſſimo patre D. Wolſtano epiſcopo tempore regis Willielmi ſenioris, coram principibus ejuſdem regis, Remigio ſcilicet Lincolnienſi epiſcopo, & comite Waltero Giffardo, & Henrico de Feriers, & Adâ fratre Eudonis dapiferi regis, qui ad inquirendas & deſcribendas poſſeſſiones & conſuetudines tam regis quam principum ſuorum, in hâc provinciâ, & in plurimis aliis, ab ipſo rege deſtinati ſunt eo tempore quo totam Angliam rex deſcribi fecit," &c.

All who were capable of ſervice were obliged to attend; and they were to make a preſentment, or verdict, to the commiſſioners. This contained a general ſurvey of every county, and of the ſeveral hundreds, rapes, laths, wapentakes, cities, towns, boroughs, manors, vills, caſtles, &c. how many hides, carucates, virgates, half-hides, bovates, oxgangs, leucæ, quarentenæ, were in each manor, and their value; an account of what paſture, meadow, wood, foreſts, commons, parks, farm-houſes, demeſne tenements, houſes, burgeſſes, and the names of their owners; how many men, of what condition, whether free-men, ſoc-men, bordars, villans, cottagers, ſlaves, merchants, workmen, aliens [Francigenæ], and Normans; what goods and chattels, treaſure and ready money, each perſon had; how much he owed, and what was owing to him; rents, tribute, tax [cenſus], ſervices, tolls, cuſtoms, homage where due, and what works were to be done for the lords of the manor; what beaſts, as ſheep, hogs, goats, load-horſes[8], cart-horſes[9], working-horſes[10], colts, aſſes, oxen, cows, calves, ſtocks of bees, were in every manor; what mills, rivers, fiſheries, fiſhponds, marſhes, vineyards; and their value then, and in the time of Edward the Confeſſor.

One would have expected that the order to make the ſurvey with all poſſible exactneſs ſhould have been punctually executed; the commiſſioners, as well as the jury, having juſt reaſon, from the king's known character and imperious temper, to dread his anger and ſevere puniſhment, in caſe of the leaſt fraud and connivance. The author of the Saxon Chronicle ſays, "The king held a grand council, and deliberated with his nobles in what manner and by whom this land ſhould be inhabited; for this purpoſe he ſent his ſervants throughout all England, and into every county, with power to enquire how many hundreds were contained in each county, what lands and flocks in it belonged to the king, and what ſubſidy it ought to pay yearly. He alſo authorized them to take an account how much land belonged to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, and earls, and in ſhort what lands and flocks belonged to each Engliſhman, and the value thereof in money. He ordered them to ſurvey the lands ſo diligently, that there ſhould not be a hide, nor even a yard of land, nor indeed, which is ſhameful to mention, though he was not aſhamed to cauſe it to be done, an ox, or a cow, or a hog omitted, but what ſhould be brought into the account, and delivered to him in writing[11]." Ne quidem bos aut vacca aut porcus prætermittebatur, are the words of the Saxon Chronicle; quot animalia, ſay Roger de Hoveden and Henry de Huntingdon; what number of men and of beaſts, ſays Fabian.

In ſome counties the king's orders, we have reaſon to think, were duly obſerved: but, if the inſtructions were general, it is certain that the mandate was in many caſes very negligently obeyed.

In Leiceſterſhire, five oxen for the plough are introduced at Lubbeſthorp[12], and a wood with 100 hogs at Aſbby-Folvile[13]: but theſe inſtances ſtand almoſt ſingly; and, in general, as little attention is paid to this ſpecies of enquiry throughout the whole ſurvey.

By this ſurvey, however, the Conqueror was enabled to fix the proportion of Dane-geld on the property of each land-holder[1]. This tax, called alſo Hide-geld, or Hidage, and Carucage, Here-geld, or Tributum Militare vel Navale, was a kind of land-tax, which began to be collected by king Æthelred about the year 1002, to raiſe a ſubſidiary tribute for the Danes, after they had ravaged this kingdom. It was originally an annual land-tax of two ſhillings generally on every hide of arable land; was the firſt ſtated tax of that kind; and though called Dane-geld, becauſe paid to the Danes, retained that name long after, when it was appropriated to different uſes. Edward the Confeſſor ſuſpended the payment of this tax during part of his time. William levied it in the ſecond year of his reign; how often afterwards does not appear. But in 1084 or 1086 he increaſed it to 6*s.*[2] an hide, which was three times more than it ever appears to have been before. In the reign of William Rufus it was 4*s.*; 7 Henry I. 3*s.*; in the reign of Stephen 2*s.* an hide. It continued to be collected to 21 Hen. II. and probably later[3]. Perhaps the rate varied according to the exigence of affairs, or the avaricious humour of the prince; and it is ſingular, that the geld is never once mentioned in the county of Northampton.

Some articles the jury were charged to enquire of were thought unneceſſary to be inſerted in the original framed out of the returns: which will account for the different deſcriptions different writers give of it; ſome ſaying it contained an account of every particular the jury were charged to enquire of; others, more correctly, confining it to ſuch only as were extracted from the returns, and tranſcribed into the work.

The following extract from ſir William Blackſtone's Commentaries on the Laws of England explains the motives for the ſurvey being originally taken.

"An invaſion from Denmark being apprehended "19 W. I. and the military conſtitution of the Saxons being then laid aſide, and no other introduced "in its ſtead, the kingdom was wholly defenceleſs; "which occaſioned the king to bring over a large "army of Normans and Bretons, who were quartered "upon every landholder, and greatly oppreſſed the "people. This apparent weakneſs, together with "the grievances occaſioned by a foreign force, might "co-operate with the king's remonſtrances, and the "better incline the nobility to liſten to his propoſals "for putting them in a poſture of defence. For, as "ſoon as the danger was over, the king held a great "council, to enquire into the ſtate of the nation; the "immediate conſequence of which was the compiling "of the great ſurvey called Domeſday-book, which "was finiſhed in the next year: and in the latter "end of that very year the king was attended by all "his nobility at Sarum, where all the principal landholders ſubmitted their lands to the yoke of military tenure, became the king's vaſſals, and did homage and fealty to his perſon. This ſeems to have "been the æra of formally introducing feudal tenures by law in England[4]."

Accordingly Mr. Madox obſerves[5], that in 1086, as appears by Domeſday-book, the Norman lords and knights were in actual ſeiſin of ſeveral fiefs, which the Conqueror conferred upon them. And ſir Martin Wright[6] is of opinion, that this ſurvey was taken upon, or ſoon after, our anceſtors' conſent to tenures; in order to diſcover the quantity of every man's fee, and to fix his homage. The ſtrength of the nation could alſo be aſcertained by it[7].

At the time of this ſurvey, indeed, if we are diſpoſed to give entire credit to our old hiſtorians, not only all the baronies and great military fiefs, but all civil and eccleſiaſtical poſts of honour or profit were in the hands of foreigners. Eadmer informs us, that William I. diſplaced the Engliſh from all poſts of government, both in church and ſtate[8]: that the biſhopricks and abbacies, the earldoms and baronies, were diſtributed among his Normans[9]." Ingulphus ſays, "Comitatus & baronias, epiſcopatus & prælatias totius terre ſuis Normannis rex diſtribuit, & vix aliquem Anglicum ad honoris ſtatum, vel alicujus dominii principatum aſcendere permiſit[10]." And Henry of Huntingdon aſſures us that, in the 21ſt year of William I, "Vix aliquis princeps de progenie Anglorum erat in Angliâ[11]."

Theſe writers, however, uſe the word vix, and therefore cannot be charged with a want of exactneſs in this inſtance; but William of Malmeſbury[12] poſitively ſays, "Anglia facta eſt externorum habitatio & alienigenorum dominatio. Nullus hodie Anglus vel dux, vel pontifex, vel abbas." And yet it is clear, from the charter of Henry I, that there were in his time ſome Engliſh barons in Worceſterſhire, who held of the crown; and, as lord Lyttelton obſerves, it cannot be ſuppoſed that they were confined only to that county.

The inquiſitions being taken, they were tranſmitted to Wincheſter, and the ſubſtance of them was methodized, and formed into the record now called Domeſday; the extracting and claſſing the ſubſtance of the returns under the general heads of Terra Regis, &c. being a ſubſequent work, collected after the original rotuli were returned into the Exchequer. When Domeſday-Book was compiled, they were probably thrown by or deſtroyed; but ſome copies of them might be taken. Sir Henry Spelman was of opinion that theſe inquiſitions, or, as he calls them, Comitatuum Enarrationes, were all loſt. Mr. Selden[13] gives the names of the jury in ſeveral of the hundreds in Cambridgeſhire, which he found in a MS. belonging to the church of Ely, coæval, as he thinks, with Domeſday itſelf. This is probably the manuſcript in vellum, bound up with the Liber Elienſis, marked Tiberius A. VI. 4. in the Cottonian library, which contains a copy of the inquiſition of the juries for moſt of the hundreds of that county, in a fair antient character, of about the time of Henry II.[14] The Exeter manuſcript[15] of Domeſday is thought to be one of theſe returns; and ſome have ſuppoſed the leaſt of the two volumes in the Chapter-houſe to be of the ſame kind.

This ſurvey was begun, according to the annals of Waverley, A. D. 1083, 17 William I; according to the Saxon Chronicle 1085; but the Red Book of the Exchequer ſtates it in 14 William I. 1080, and finiſhed in the 20th year of his reign, 1086. The mode in which the queen is mentioned[16], who died Nov. 2, 1083, ſhews that it was begun before that period. The date of its concluſion is confirmed by the concurrent teſtimony of ancient writers, and by the following entry, written in a coæval hand, in capitals, at the end of the ſecond volume of the manuſcript:

> ANNO MILLESIMO OCTOGESIMO SEXTO AB INCARNATIONE DOMINI, VIGESIMO VERO REGNI WILLELMI, FACTA EST ISTA DESCRIPTIO, NON SOLUM PER HOS TRES COMITATUS, SED ETIAM PER ALIOS.

The Conqueror conſidered the completion of this ſurvey as an event of great importance, and deſigned it ſhould be the commencement of a new æra; a donation made by him ſoon after to the abbey of St.

Append. Hon. Richm. p. 3.—Geldum and Geldare come from the Saxon ᵹelꝺan, or ᵹẏlꝺan, to pay; and from this word, by turning the ᵹ into a y, we have the verb to yield.—Of Danegeld ſee hereafter, p. 216.

Peter at Weſtminſter, of eight hides of lands in Windſor Foreſt, having this remarkable date, Poſt deſcriptionem totius Angliæ; and the lands were to be quietæ à modo ſemper & liberæ à ſcoto & ab omni med conſuetudine, & cenſu pecuniæ quæ Geld vocatur Angliæ[1].

A tax of 6*s*. was raiſed upon every ploughland, to defray the expences the king had been at in compiling the ſurvey, which was three times more than Danegeld appears to have been aſſeſſed at before[2].

The original conſiſts of two volumes, a greater and a leſs, called Great and Little Domeſday-book, both written in a fair legible hand, nearly pure Roman, with a mixture of Saxon; and contains the greateſt part of England and part of Wales, Hereford being then eſteemed a Welſh county; but all the reſt of Wales is omitted. Theſe famous volumes were conſtantly kept with the king's ſeal in the repoſitory by the ſide of the Tally-Court in the Exchequer, under three locks and keys, in the charge of the auditor, the chamberlains and deputy-chamberlains of the Exchequer; till in 1696 they were removed, with a great number of books, rolls, deeds, &c. in that treaſury, and depoſited, with the other records, in the Chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter; where they now remain in the cuſtody of a keeper or inſpector of the records in the Receipt of the Exchequer[3]. And it is not leſs extraordinary than true, that, notwithſtanding the great diſproportion in the value of money two centuries ago and at this preſent time, the fees of 6*s*. 8*d*. for ſearching and 4*d*. a line for tranſcribing from Domeſday-book remain invariably the ſame, as appears from an inquiſition of Exchequer fees taken in the reign of queen Elizabeth; and they were then denominated antient fees. It is worthy alſo of remark, that not the ſmalleſt ſpark of jealouſy has appeared in the gentlemen of the office, who muſt have experienced a ſenſible diminution of their fees from the publication of the book.

The firſt and largeſt volume, finely written on both ſides of 382 leaves of vellum, in a ſmall, but plain character, in double columns on each page, contains theſe counties in the following order:

Chenth, Kent.	fol. 1
Sudſexe, Suſſex.	16
Sudrie, Surry.	30
Ханteſcire, Hants.	37 b.
In nova Foreſta, et circa eam, In the new Foreſt, and about it,	51

Weſtreding, Weſt Riding.	376
Chetſteven, Keſteven,	376 b.

The ſecond volume is in quarto, written on 450 leaves of vellum, in ſingle columns, in a fair character, ſomewhat larger than that of the other volume; and contains three counties:

Exſeſſa, Eſſex,	fol. 1
Norfulc, Nordfolc, Norfolk.	109
Sudfulc, Suffolk.	281

The counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Weſtmoreland, are omitted in the grand ſurvey. It is probable, the king's commiſſioners might find it impoſſible to take any exact ſurvey of thoſe counties, as they had ſuffered ſo much by the ravages of war; or they might be at that time in the hands of the Scots, or elſe in ſuch condition as no commiſſioners dared adventure into them, to take the returns of juries, and make the ſurvey[4].

Part of the county of Rutland is included in Nottinghamſhire, p. 293; and part in Lincolnſhire, p. 367.

Lancaſhire does not occur; but that part which lies between the rivers Ribble [Ripa] and Merſey [Merſa] is ſurveyed in Yorkſhire or Cheſhire. The reſt might be omitted, either by the king's death, or by the debateable lands being then ſubject to inroads.

As to the biſhoprick of Durham, which is likewiſe wholly omitted, all the country between the Teis and Tine had been conferred by Alfred on the biſhop of this ſee; who, at the coming in of the Conqueror, was reputed a count palatine.

The Eaſt-Riding and the moſt Southerly parts of Yorkſhire were made a perfect deſart, in 1069, to cruſh an inſurrection in the North; and in 1070, the king laid waſte the counties North of the Humber, particularly all between York and Durham, for ſixty miles.

Mr. Selden, in his preface to Eadmer, p. iv, ſpeaking of Domeſday, ſays, he does not think that in the whole Chriſtian world there is any public record of authority but what is ſome ages later than this.

Mr. Hearne, after inſerting a table of the abbreviations uſed in this ſurvey, in page 122 of the preface to a Collection of Diſcourſes of ſeveral learned Engliſh Antiquaries[5], adds, "He hath often wiſhed this record was printed entirely, there being no ſurvey of any other country equal to it. The antient Roman Itineraries have been always valued, and that deſervedly; yet they are trifles in compariſon with this moſt admirable ſurvey, done with ſuch exactneſs and ſo much diligence as would be hardly credible, were it not certain that the Normans were reſolved to make the beſt uſe of their conqueſt, and to ſecure every inch of ground to themſelves."

Nothing, however, was done towards ſuch a publication till the Houſe of Lords, in the year 1767, determined to print their Journals and other Parliamentary Records; when the publiſhing of Domeſday-book was ſtrongly urged by ſeveral gentlemen, anxious that ſo valuable a record ſhould not be entirely loſt in caſe of any accident happening to the original; and deſirous alſo that the publick ſhould be made acquainted with a book of much curioſity and of ſome uſe, hitherto known only to a few. In conſequence of which, the Board of Treaſury referred the matter to the Society of Antiquaries, to conſider whether it would be moſt adviſeable to have it printed with types, or to have a fac-ſimile copy engraved from the original. Upon enquiry of many eminent printers, it was urged that the combining and ſhifting types of a great variety of characters, with very minute differences, would be attended with many more errors than are met with in common books, and that a careful tracing of the original engraved on copper-plates would give the moſt faithful and exact copy that could be obtained. This opinion being ſtated to the Board of Treaſury, their lordſhips ordered an eſtimate to be made of the expence of engraving the book; and one was accordingly given in, amounting to upwards of £20,000. which, though far from being an extravagant price when the expence of engraving and rolling off 1250 copies of 1664 plates is conſidered, was thought much too large a ſum for ſuch a buſineſs. A reſolution was therefore taken to print it at the public expence with types; which the Editor of this work had the honour to project, and the late Mr. Joſeph Jackſon[1] the ſkill to execute; and with which, by the munificence of Parliament, under the auſpices of a Sovereign who is the univerſal Patron of the Arts, the two volumes of this noble ſurvey were in 1783 completed at the preſs, under the immediate inſpection of a very able officer, the late Abraham Farley, eſq. F. A. S. whoſe induſtry and abilities are well known, and who had been familiar with this and other records for more than 50 years. But it is to be regretted that no title-page has been provided for it[2]; nor is it accompanied either with an Introduction, a Gloſſary, or an Index.

[3] There is kept in the Exchequer another book called Domeſday, with many pictures and gilt letters in the beginning, and referring to the time of the Confeſſor; which has led ſome into a miſtake that it was compoſed by his order. From the ſpecimen of this record, engraved in our Plate I. N° II. it will appear that it is only an epitome of the Norman Survey.—Another abridgement is kept in the Remembrancer's office; which is of a quarto ſize, and differs from the folio kept in the Chapter-houſe, the words being more abbreviated, and an account is given of the lands only; whereas the larger one deſcribes the lands, together with the villans and ſtock upon the ſame. A ſpecimen of this Domeſday is engraved in Dr. Naſh's Worceſterſhire.—Of the other fac-ſimiles in plate I. N° III. is from the Teſta de Nevill; IV. and V. from a Subſidy Roll of 1416; and VI. from Charyte's Rentale of Leiceſter Abbey.

[4] Brady, Introd. Append. 17.

[5] Alſo in his Gloſſary to Peter Langtoft's Chronicle. This is now the leſs neceſſary, ſince Mr. Kelham's very uſeful illuſtration of this antient Record is itſelf one entire table of its abbreviations.

A ſpecimen of the original Domeſday[3] for Leiceſterſhire is exhibited in plate I; and the county at large is annexed, in the types above alluded to.

That part of the ſurvey which relates to Dorſetſhire, was prefixed to Mr. Hutchins's excellent Hiſtory of that county in the ſame types[4].

The firſt fac-ſimile copy of a whole county was engraved for Mr. Manning's Hiſtory of Surrey; but the firſt copy of a whole county ſo engraved, that has actually been publiſhed, is annexed to Dr. Naſh's Parochial Collections for Worceſterſhire.

Other engraved ſpecimens may be ſeen in Gale's Regiſtrum Honoris de Richmond, p. 238; in Morant's Eſſex; a ſmall one in Groſe's Antiquities; and a very bad one in Hickes's Theſaurus, vol. I. p. 144.

The order generally obſerved in writing the ſurvey is to ſet down in the firſt place at the head of every county (except Cheſter[5] and Rutland[6]) the king's name, Rex Willelmus; and then a liſt of the biſhops, religious houſes, churches, and great men, according to their rank[7], that held of the king in capite[8], in that county; likewiſe of his thanes, miniſters, and ſervants; with a numerical figure in red ink before them, for the better finding them in the book. In ſome counties, the cities and capital boroughs are taken notice of, before the liſt of the great tenants is entered, with the particular laws or cuſtoms of each; and, in others, they are inſerted promiſcuouſly[9].

This is a very valuable part of Domeſday, though hitherto unnoticed; and fully confirms to us, that William the Conqueror made but little alteration in the antient cuſtoms which prevailed in the time of Edward the Confeſſor[10]. Among the cities and boroughs whoſe cuſtoms are noticed, we have in this county only the town of Leiceſter, p. 230. a. 1.

Conſuetudo is elſewhere uſed in the ſenſe of an old rent, ſervice, or cuſtom. Thus, under Bruneſtaneſtorp, p. 232. a. 2. we learn that Hec terra jacet ad Ledeceſtre, cum omnibus conſuetudinibus ſuis.

In this ſurvey, p. 230. a. 1. "civitas de Ledeceſtre—XXIV domos in eodem burgo," are both applied to Leiceſter; and in the Anglo-Saxon books, civitates are rendered by burghs, and burghs are latinized by civitates. After the Conqueſt, however, there ſeems to be a notion of ſome difference, by the general uſe of both words with the diſcriminative article and between them; yet, in charters much later than that period, particularly in that of Leiceſter, city[11] is uſed promiſcuouſly with burgh; which ſhews that lord Coke's obſervation, that every city is, or was, a biſhop's ſee[12], is generally exact[13].

After the liſt of the tenants, the manors and poſſeſſions themſelves which belong to the king, and alſo to each owner throughout the whole county, whether they lie in the ſame or different hundreds, are collected, and minutely noted, with their under-tenants[14].

The king's demeſnes, under the title Terra regis, always ſtand firſt, as Rex Willelmus, Rex W. Will. Rex Anglorum, or Rex, tenet or habet. Then the lands which belong to ſome biſhop, religious houſe, or great tenant, as Terra Archiep'i, &c.[15]

In the ſmaller volume, under Eſſex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, the liberi homines are ranked ſeparate; and there is alſo a title for Invaſiones ſuper regem[16].

The deſcription is generally thus: how many hides, or carucates, the land is gelded or taxed at; whoſe it was in the time of king Edward; who the preſent owner, and the ſub-tenants; what and how much arable land, meadow, paſture, and wood, there is; how much in demeſne, how much in tenancy, and what number of ploughs it will keep; what mills and fiſhings, how many freemen, ſocmen, coliberti, cotarii, bordarii, radmanni, radcheniſtres, villans, maid-ſervants, and bondmen, there are; in ſome counties, what young cattle, ſheep, working-horſes, &c. are upon the land; and how many hogs the woods will ſupport; ſometimes what churches there are, and how many prieſts or parſons[17]; what cuſtomary rents, preſtations, and ſervices, are to be paid and rendered out of the lands; what has been added to the manor, what with-held from it, and by whom; what land is waſte; what the whole was let for in the time of king Edward; and what the net rent, whether it was too high rented, or whether it might be improved. But all entries in it are not alike, they being more or leſs exact and particular in ſome counties than others, according to the care, diligence, and induſtry, of the commiſſioners and ſcribes[1].

[2] The title intended for it was "DOMESDAY BOOK: Seu, Liber Cenſualis Willielmi Primi Regis Angliæ. Inter archivos regni in domo capitulari Weſtmonaſterii aſſervatus. Jubente Rege auguſtiſſimo Georgio Tertio prelo mandatus, 1783."

[3] A complete copy of the whole book, in two volumes; one, containing Norfolk, Suffolk, and Richmondſhire; the other, all the reſt; was collated by that honourable and learned Antiquary and Lover of all learning the lord William Howard, younger ſon of Thomas duke of Norfolk; and was long preſerved in the library of that noble family at Naworth Caſtle in Cumberland. Cat. Manuſcriptor. Angliæ, vol. II. p. 14. His lordſhip was a Leiceſterſhire landholder; as will be ſeen under Narborough. A fac-ſimile copy for Norfolk, taken for Thomas Howard earl of Arundel, by ſerjeant Gibbon Goddard, recorder of Lynne 1650, was ſucceſſively in the hands of Peter Le Neve, Thomas Martin, John Ives, and now of Mr. Gough.

[4] Parts of Domeſday for the counties of Hertford, Northampton, Eſſex, and Cheſter, are given in the hiſtories of the reſpective counties, by Chauncey, Salmon, Morton, Morant, and ſir Peter Leiceſter; and in Hearne's edition of Heming's Chartulary, as much as relates to the church of Worceſter; but none of them perfectly correct.

[5] Cheſter was a county palatine; and earl Hugo held the whole of it of the king, except what belonged to the biſhop of Lichfield; who was alſo called biſhop of Cheſter, from his reſiding there.

[6] The landholders in this county being few, the king's land, and that of the reſt of the owners, is not diſtinguiſhed by titles and numbers, although they are ſeparately ſet down.

[8] The whole number of tenants in capite (beſides biſhops, abbots, priors, and church-men, and the king's thanes, eleemoſinaries, miniſters, and ſervants), who held all the lands in England of the Conqueror, was about 420. All others that had any eſtates held of the great tenants by meſne tenure; and each of theſe had a few ſocmen, and an infinite number of men of ſlaviſh condition, called ſervi, villani, bordarii, and cotarii, under them. [9] Kelham, p. 3. 6, 7, 8. [10] Ibid. p. 16.

[11] "In the time of the Saxons, all cities and great towns were called by the name of Buꞃᵹ, or Bẏꞃiᵹ, i. e. Burg, or Borough; and even the great city of London was called by the name of Buꞃᵹ." Forteſcue, of Abſolute and Limited Monarchy, p. 65. See, under the Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 112, a ſatisfactory elucidation of this ſubject.

[12] That Leiceſter was a biſhop's ſee, is proved in Dr. Pegge's Diſſertation, Appendix to the Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 1.

[13] Glouceſter is one exception, which is called civitas in Domeſday, though it had then no biſhop.

[14] Kelham, p. 4. [15] Ibid. [16] Ibid. [17] Perſonæ.

It is certain, that all lands, both of the laity and clergy, were at the Survey held of the king directly in capite; no land whatever, or townſhip, being excepted from the account then taken; and thoſe towns which are not mentioned in Domeſday[2], as having no manor in them, are accounted for in ſome neighbouring lordſhips and towns where the manors ſtood, and are there aſſeſſed. However, we are told in the Survey itſelf, that 7 hundreds out of 12, in Worceſterſhire, are omitted in that county, they being ſo quiet and free, that the ſheriff had nothing to do with them; and it is often ſaid, that ſuch land was never hideted, and that the hundred can give no account of it; therefore the conjecture of Camden, that many parts are left out of Domeſday, "quia penſitationibus liberæ," may ſtill be well founded[3].

Among the antient demeſne lands in this county, ſtyled Terra Regis, the places of moſt note were Bowden and Rodeley[4]. Both theſe had been held by king Edward the Confeſſor, and both were retained by the Conqueror. Under Bowden, ten other lordſhips were ſubordinate; and under the ſoke of Rodeley twenty-three, ſix of which ſtill continue annexed to it, independent of all eccleſiaſtical viſitation.

Two other inſtances of a dependance of ſeveral lordſhips on one paramount manor occur in this county. One under the lands of Goiſfrid de Wirce; whoſe lordſhip of Melton Mowbray[5] compriſed ten other townſhips, five of which are ſtill hamlets to that pariſh. The other, under earl Hugo, to whoſe manor of Barrow[6] twelve lordſhips were appended.

Out of land held under the king at Shepeſhed[7], ſix pounds were paid, by order of the biſhop of Baieux, for the ſervice of the Iſle of Wight.

Thurleſton[8], one of the manors which was held by the king, was obtained by exchange with Goiſfrid de Wirce; who received inſtead of it Norton and Staunton Wyvile, with ſix ploughlands in Newton, and (as the commiſſioners were informed by the homagers of Goiſfrid) a ploughland and a half in Withcoc.

The names of the hundreds in many counties have undergone a great change. Lincolnſhire is divided into 30 wapentakes or hundreds; yet there are only about 19 which bear any thing like the ſame name in Domeſday as they do at preſent; and in Warwickſhire there is not now one remaining out of the ten there ſet down[9]. In Leiceſterſhire they have continued the ſame; except only that Sparkenhoe has been taken out of Guthlaxton, and Goſcote divided into Eaſt and Weſt.

The antient demeſne of the crown, as recorded in this Survey, conſiſted of 1422 manors in different counties, beſides ſome ſcattered lands and farms not comprehended therein, and quit-rents paid out of ſeveral other manors[10].

Mr. Webb's[11] ſuppoſition, "that the demeſne lands belonging to the king and queen, and thoſe in the hands of their immediate tenants and farmers, though aſſeſſed, did not pay the tax of Danegeld, becauſe that would have been paying with one hand what they were to receive with the other," is probably unfounded; "de quibus omnibus (domibus) habet rex geldum ſuum" appearing to be language rather too ſtrong for a bare aſſeſſment. The houſes were in Leiceſter (fol. 230. a.); and they belonged to the king, the archbiſhop of York, earl Hugo, and the abbeys of Coventry and Croyland. The fact is, the antient demeſne was aſſeſſed by the king's prerogative[12], and the talliage and aid paid to his uſe, in virtue of that prerogative, as often as his neceſſities required; but no tax could be laid upon the lands of others without the authority of parliament.

Cities and towns which had no arable land paid geld in proportion to a certain number of hides. In Leiceſterſhire the king had forty-two pounds ten ſhillings as a compoſition for all rents from the city and county.

The demeſne lands of the great lords, and thoſe who held by military ſervice, were probably exempt, becauſe it was unreaſonable that thoſe whoſe perſons were by tenure obliged to ſerve in the wars ſhould be doubly charged for their lands for the ſame ſervice. The eſtates of many other perſons alſo were originally, or in a courſe of years, exempted.

As the demeſne lands of churches and religious houſes were excuſed in conſequence of their eleemoſinary grants antecedent to the commencement of this tax, the clergy claimed an exemption from it as an original right; but it extended only to their demeſne lands, not to their other eſtates. They were indeed ſometimes exempted by writ, or by the king's particular order. The barons of the Exchequer and ſheriffs of counties, aſſeſſors and collectors of this tax, were alſo exempted. By means of theſe exemptions the produce of the tax was greatly diminiſhed in the Conqueror's time[13]. The rectifying of this abuſe, and the additional hidage that might reaſonably be expected from the improvement and increaſe of arable lands ſubſequent to A. D. 1013, were probably farther reaſons for making the ſurvey[14].

The diſagreement between the ſum total in the time of Edward the Confeſſor and William the Conqueror is ſometimes very great; owing perhaps to improvements during that interval, or want of exactneſs in the firſt of theſe ſurveys. Thus Sceltone[15], which at the firſt period was valued at five ſhillings, was increaſed to ſeventy ſhillings. Croft, from ſixty-eight pence, was advanced to forty ſhillings; one ploughland there, which had been entirely waſte, was ſo improved as to produce a rent of five ſhillings[16]; and Burſtall, formerly worth 40 ſhillings, was increaſed to five ounces of gold[17]. Material alterations alſo are elſewhere perceivable; though in ſeveral places the lands remained at the ſame value, and in ſome few were become worſe; as at Stapleton[18], where they were lowered from 34 ſhillings to 20; and at Bebi from 60 ſhillings to 40[19].

Fleckney, Witeneſto, Welham, and Aleby, are all deſcribed as waſte; yet the firſt is returned as worth 12*d*.; the ſecond at 2*s*.; the other two at 3*s*. each[20].

Claxton and Howes are twice entered; p. 235. a. 1. and p. 237. a. 1; in nearly the ſame words.

Under Burbach, p. 231, a. 2. it is particularly pointed out that land which had been given to the abbot of Coventry in 1043, when worth only two ſhillings a year, had been advanced, in leſs than 40 years, to four pounds. "Valuit II ſolidos quando abbas recepit, modo IIII libras."

Originally, when lands were given to the church they were burdened with military ſervice; but when the neceſſity of it became leſs, people in giving lands to the church exacted no other return than prayers and ſuch religious exerciſes[21].

The payments which occur in Domeſday-Book, in this county, were made ad numerum[22], or ad pondus[23]; that is, by tale, or by weight.

[23] The king had at Leiceſter, for all rents from the city and county, "XLII lib. & x ſolidos ad pondus." Ibid.—In ſome parts of the ſurvey this is expreſſed by ad penſum, or penſam, weight; and in others the payments were in bullion (ad arſuram), refined ſilver or gold, which had paſſed the fire, and was without alloy.—When Domeſday-book was compiled, there was always a fire ready in the Exchequer; and if they liked not the alloy of the money, they burnt it, and then weighed it. Brady's Hiſtory.—If the tenant would not have his money melted, he was to pay 12*d*. in the pound over. Kelham, p. 254.—The pound of ſilver here mentioned weighed 12 ounces, and was equal to 72 ſolidi of our preſent money; the ſolidus conſiſted of 12*d*. and was equal in weight to three of our preſent ſhillings. Clarke on Coins, p. 345.

Pecunia[1], in p. 235. a. 2. under Waltham, means that its value had been before given, p. 233. a. 1. The pecunia, or valuation, of Stapleton, p. 231. a. 2. is included in that of Barwell.

It is fortunate for my readers that there was a monetarius at Leiceſter when this ſurvey was taken; as it gives an opportunity of introducing a regular ſeries of the productions of that mint, delineated and engraved by an artiſt of much merit, Mr. James Baſire, the younger, under the immediate direction of my late excellent friend Mr. Southgate, whoſe valuable cabinet furniſhed a large proportion of the originals[2], and who kindly illuſtrated the whole by an eſſay, for which his profound ſkill in that particular ſcience moſt eminently qualified him. The monetarii were entitled to conſiderable privileges and exemptions[3].

Ad numerum de viginti in ora, is a phraſe which occurs in the ſecond line of the ſurvey for this county; and on the true value of the ora ſome difficulties have ariſen. Mr. Camden, with a freedom and openneſs of mind equal to his other abilities, very honeſtly confeſſed that he knew not what to make of it. "The Danes brought in a reckoning of money by ores (per oras), which is mentioned in Domeſday-book, whether it were as ſeveral coins, or a certain ſum, I know not; but I collect out of the abbey-book of Burton, that 20 oræ were ratable to two marks of ſilver[4]." Mr. Lambarde ſuppoſed it a braſs coin; Mr. Somner, that no ſuch coin exiſted; but that it always ſignified an ounce, of which there were two ſorts, the one of ſixteen, the other of twenty pence. Dr. Hickes was uncertain whether it was a coin, or only money of account. And biſhop Fleetwood[5] obſerves, "There is alſo ſome diſpute whether the pound was made up of 12 or of 15 ounces. In the 30th of king Etheldred's laws (as they are in J. Brompton) you will find theſe words: "Let thoſe who overlook the ports ſee that every weight at the market be the weight by which my money is received, and let each of them be marked, ſo that 15 oræ make a pound." And in Sir Henry Spelman's Gloſſary you will find that ora ſignifies uncia; and ſo in other learned authors. But the ſame moſt learned knight tell us, that ora was alſo a piece of money, valued at 15*d*. for which he quotes this paſſage: Plac. coram Rege, Term. Mich. 37 Hen. III. Rot. 4. "The men of Berkeholt, com. Suffolk, ſay, that in the time of king Henry they had a cuſtom, that when they would marry out their daughters, they were wont to pay, for leave ſo to do, 2 oræ, which are valued at 32*d*. Now 15 oræ make juſt a Saxon pound; 48*s*. or 15 times 16 oræ make 240*d*."

Mr. Clarke ſays, the leſſer ora ſeems to have been worth 18 denarii, the greater 20[6].

The ora was the 8th part of a mark, or twelve pence, and the twentieth part of the pound ſterling[7].

A fine on the perſon in whoſe houſe a fire broke out in the city of Cheſter was 4 oræ denar'.[8]

In Domeſday-book, indeed, the ora is regularly uſed for the ounce, or twelfth part of the nummulary pound, and its perpetual valuation is twenty-pence[9]; an abundant proof, as Dufreſne has well obſerved[10], that there were, or had been, ſeveral ſorts of oræ then in uſe; and therefore, to prevent all ambiguity or diſpute between the crown and the ſubject, the ſums payable to the Exchequer were fixed at a certain value in their current caſh[11].

Quando moneta vertebatur, in Worceſterſhire and ſome other parts of Domeſday, is equivalent to mutabatur; implying perhaps a new coinage, for which the dies were brought from London[12].

The libra, or pound of ſilver, often mentioned in Domeſday, weighed 12 ounces, and was equal in weight to 72 ſolidi, or 3*l*. 12*s*. of our preſent money. The ſame weight in gold is now worth 48*l*.[13]

The ſolidus conſiſted of 12 pence, and was equal in weight to three of our preſent ſhillings[14].

At Burſtall, as already noticed, the annual value of the lordſhip is ſtated to be v unciæ auri[15].

The mark of ſilver was the Flemiſh or German mark, value 13*s*. 4*d*. or two thirds of a pound; introduced into France about the cloſe of the eleventh century, but known to the Saxons in England before that time[16]. The mark of gold, if it be the ſame with the Saxon mancus, was equal to thirty ſhillings.

A pound in that age contained three times the weight of ſilver that it does at preſent; and the ſame weight of ſilver, by the moſt probable computation, would purchaſe ten times more of the neceſſaries of life. Ten pounds, therefore, were equivalent to three hundred. To apply this, we may obſerve, that a hawk was valued at ten pounds; a baggage or ſumpter horſe at twenty ſhillings; and there is nothing ſingular in that valuation. The city of Worceſter was to pay either x libras denariorum de xx in ora, or accipitrem Norreſc', a Norway hawk; & xx ſolidos pro ſummario. And we find the ſame in Wiltſhire: "De Wilteſcire habet Rex 10 libras pro accipitre, & 20 ſolidos pro ſummario." Now, ſuppoſing a baggage-horſe at this time to be worth thirty pounds, the price the hawk was valued at is equal to three hundred pounds of our money! But, as we cannot be ſure but what was conſidered as a good and ſufficient baggage-horſe in the eleventh century might be much inferior in real worth to one at this time, we muſt think of ſome other mode of eſtimating the ſum at which the horſe was valued; and this Mr. Wyndham (in the Preface to his tranſlation of the Wiltſhire part of Domeſday-book) has happily ſuggeſted: for, finding in Biſhop Fleetwood's Chronicon Pretioſum, that the price of labour was nine-pence a week in 1351, and thinking it highly probable that it was at that time double what it had been at the time of this ſurvey, he concludes that we muſt multiply the valuations in Domeſday-book by twenty-two and a half: and, in this way of eſtimating, the ſum at which the hawk was valued will be equal to at leaſt two hundred and twenty-five pounds! Hawks, eſpecially thoſe from Norway, were in high eſtimation. Ten pounds, it appears, was an optional payment for one hawk. In Oxfordſhire we have heard that a large manor and eſtate was given for a ſingle bird. And, as the rage for the ſports of the field was ſuch as to lead to an expence ſo enormous, we muſt ceaſe to wonder that the New Foreſt in Hampſhire was made by the deſtruction of twenty pariſh-churches, many chapels and religious houſes, and twenty-ſix towns; and that the whole country was laid waſte for thirty miles together.

Mr. Warner ſays, the lands held by William I. appear, from their low valuation in the time of the Confeſſor, to have been always unproductive, in compariſon with other parts of the kingdom. But he ſhould have conſidered, that the ſurvey was made by commiſſioners appointed by the Deſpot; and as we know, from the frank confeſſion of Ingulphus, that theſe commiſſioners impoſed on their employer in the account they gave of the lands belonging to his abbey, we cannot ſuppoſe they would make any difficulty of giving in a falſe account of the value of a tract of land in which their employer was intereſted. Beſides, the valuation does not ſeem low when compared with that of other counties, nor yet when compared with other parts of the ſame county.

A few inſtances from Mr. Warner will ſhew this; and we will take them fairly as the book opens. P. 83, five hides at ſixty ſhillings; two hides and an half at four pounds; p. 83, 85, above 141 hides at ninety pounds; p. 85, ſeven hides at ſix pounds ten ſhillings; p. 87, five hides at ſeven pounds. Without needleſsly multiplying citation, we ſee plainly that the lands not in the foreſt are much oftener valued at leſs than two pounds per hide, than they are at above that ſum. In the foreſt, p. 271, one hide ſet at forty ſhillings; ibid. three yardlands at forty ſhillings; ibid. one hide, except two acres of meadow, at ten pounds; ibid. five hides, except two acres of meadow, at eight pounds; p. 273, two hides, except four acres of meadow, at three pounds; ibid. half a hide at twenty ſhillings; ibid. two yardlands and a half, except one acre of meadow, at twenty ſhillings; ibid. three yardlands at three pounds; p. 275, half a hide in the foreſt at twenty ſhillings; ibid. a hide, except fifteen acres of meadow, at forty ſhillings.

Beſides the rents which were paid in money, we meet with ſeveral other ſpecies of acknowledgement.

In Leiceſterſhire, the king had 15 ſextaries[1] of honey; from the city of Glouceſter 12. In Dorſetſhire, he had in one place 1000 eels[2], in another a right of demanding entertainment for one night[3].

In the county of Hertford (under Widehale, &c. p. 52, and in many other towns), "Hi per annum inveniebant vicecomiti IX denarios, vel duas averias & tertiam partem averiæ; reddent vicecomiti V denarios, & tertiam partem unius averiæ." Q. if horſes were not originally to be found in kind for this compoſition with the ſheriff of Leiceſterſhire? By an inquiſition taken after the death of Robert Swillington, in 1420, it appeared that, inter alia, he poſſeſſed a certain annual rent of £4. called Palfrey-ſilver[4].

The ſame compoſition for finding one averia for the ſheriff of Berks was 4*d*.

At Melton, p. 235, a. col. 1. the market is particularly noticed, as producing a rent of twenty ſhillings. Hence probably the cuſtom of merchants paying a ſum to the lord, for licence to trade in his manor[5].

At Nottingham, where the burgeſſes had been accuſtomed to enjoy the fiſhery, complaint was made of their being deprived of that privilege: "In aquâ Trente ſoliti erant piſcare; & modo querelam faciunt quod piſcare prohibentur."

De mutuatione is applied to the exchange of ſome houſes in Leiceſter[6], four of which are deſcribed as decayed (vaſtas), and five others as held cum ſaca & ſoca; a kind of tenure which carried with it great privileges and immunities[7].

Dugdale obſerves, that although the ſurvey here and there takes notice of a church being in ſuch a vill in Warwickſhire, there were many more at that time which were not ſet down. Mr. Denne therefore juſtly remarks, that only ſuch churches as were appendant to manors were recorded; or, if the churches were not ſo cloſely connected, and the prieſt only held lands that were dependant on the manor, this circumſtance would not paſs unnoticed[8].

The word eccleſia occurs once only in Leiceſterſhire. In ſpeaking of the county-town, where Hugo de Grentemaiſnell is ſaid to have had four churches, and the biſhop of Lincoln two, the latter are ſaid to be of fifteen ſhillings value. Are we to ſuppoſe there were no more churches in Leiceſterſhire at that time? or rather are we not to ſuppoſe there was a church in almoſt every place where we meet with the word preſbyter; as at Rodelei, Pachintone, Huncecote, Cnapetot, Betmeſwell, Barewell, Nortone, Dunitone, Sceltone, Rotebie, Carlintone, Noveſlei, Clanefelde, Catebie, Stantone, Langtone, Siteſtone, Aſcebi, Edmerſthop & Witham, Scopeſtone, Summerdebie, Dalbi, Barcheſtone, Botesford, Walendeham, Holwell & Chetelbi, Legre, Tiletone, Pichwell & Lubeſtorp, Ovretone, Rereſbi, Foxtone, Gutmundeſlea, Gloweſbi, Aſcbi, and Sprotone.

At Medeltone two prieſts are mentioned; at Wichingeſtone two, a clericus diſtinct from the preſbyter; and at Boſeworde two, a preſbyter and a deacon.

We may perhaps fairly conclude, that, as the two churches in Leiceſter belonging to the biſhop of Lincoln were valued at fifteen ſhillings, they had at that time no other certain revenue; and that thoſe who officiated at them depended on voluntary oblations, maſſes, and ſurplice-fees, for their ſupport. And as the word decima is never once to be found in this part of Domeſday-book, and the occaſional emoluments cannot be ſuppoſed to have been a ſufficient maintenance for the miniſters of the villages of a county ſo well-peopled as Leiceſterſhire ſeems to have been in William the Firſt's time, we are naturally led to infer, that the clergy had glebe-lands annexed to their churches, which they let out, or cultivated by their bondmen, though there is not a ſingle inſtance of the quantum belonging to any particular clergyman, conſidered as the pariſh-prieſt. Godvin, Ernebern, and Aluric, the prieſts, who held lands of the king at Petlinge, Svinford, and Wiceſtan, under the title of Elemoſinæ Regis, p. 231. a. 2. it ſeems highly probable, held them as eſtates of inheritance, or at leaſt not merely in their clerical capacity; though, to ſpeak ingenuouſly, we know not well what idea to annex to the words de elemoſinâ Regis; but it is clear, that of whatever kind thoſe eſtates were, they might be mortgaged. From the Survey, p. 232, a. 1. Huardus had Seveſbi, which is ſaid to be de elemoſinâ Regis, in mortgage (in vadimonio), and a knight held it. Perhaps theſe livings were a kind of donative from the king, or lord of the manor; or the lands might be penſions from the crown.

It ſeems probable indeed that the clergy of this county did not rank high in the eſtimation of the Norman commiſſioners or their clerks; for we often ſee them very rudely placed between the villani and the bordarii. But it is no wonder: they ſeem to have been very indifferently provided for; and wherever that is the caſe, the degree of eſtimation they will have with inſolence of rank, or inſolence of office, will, in general, be accordingly.

We do not find any notice of tithes in Leiceſterſhire; and had they never been mentioned in any other part of this ſurvey, "it might have been thought," as Mr. Selden obſerves, "that they had been omitted, as a more ſacred profit than was fit to be taxed in ſuch a deſcription." But at Boſeham in Suſſex (Terr. Oſberni Epiſcopi), we have, "Decimam eccleſiæ clerici tenent, & valet XL*s*." In Hampſhire we find "(Terr. ejuſd. Epiſcopi), Eccleſia Sancti Michaelis de Monte tenet de rege, in Baſingeſtockes hundred, unam eccleſiam cum unâ hidâ & decimam de manerio de Baſingeſtockes. Ibi eſt Preſbyter." And again in the ſame county "(Terr. Regis), Rex tenet Wallope. Ibi eccleſia, cui pertinet una hida, & medietas decimæ manerii, & totam Cirſet (i. e. Cyrkſceat, church-rent), & decima villanorum 46 denarii, medietas agrorum. Ibi eſt adhuc eccleſiola ad quam pertinent 7 acræ de decimâ." And there are other inſtances of the payment of tithes to the pariſh-prieſts in the ſame county.

The mention of tithes in this ſurvey is, however, very rare, even when churches are mentioned.

"In ſome counties, as Somerſet, Devon, Cornwall, and ſome few others, you ſhall rarely have a pariſh-church noted; but in others very often churches are; but very few examples of their having tithes. Sometimes alſo grants of tithes by large owners are there mentioned, out of which it may be well thought that the moieties or third parts of tithes belonging to this or that church had their beginning[9]."

The truth ſeems to be, that the cuſtom of paying tithes to the pariſh-prieſt was not, at the time of this ſurvey, generally eſtabliſhed[10]; and Leiceſterſhire, as far as appears, it was no where the uſage; but the occupier of the land might pay his tithe to what church he pleaſed[1]. In the ſurvey of Derbyſhire, p. 280, we read, "De Stori anteceſſore Walteri de Aincurt dicunt, quod ſine alicujus licentiâ potuit facere ſibi eccleſiam in ſuâ terrâ & in ſuâ ſocâ, & ſuam decimam mittere quo vellet." It was under this idea, that the great owners of lands thought themſelves authorized to grant the tithes of their demeſnes to religious houſes. Innumerable inſtances of ſuch grants may be found in Dugdale's Monaſticon; and ſo the practice, it may reaſonably be ſuppoſed, continued for ſome centuries after this ſurvey was made; "for, it is reported by ſome antients of good credit, that ſufficient remedy was not provided againſt that practice of the former courſe of arbitrary diſpoſition of tithes, till the general council of Lyons, held under pope Gregorie the Tenth, in the year 1274, in which it was conſtituted, 'ut nulli hominum deinceps liceat decimas ſuas ad libitum, ut antea, ubi vellet aſſignare, ſed matrici eccleſiæ omnes decimas perſolverent.' So Randal Higden, the monk of Cheſter, Henry Knighton, abbot of Leiceſter, and Thomas of Walſingham, a monk of St. Alban's, tell us; and all three of them lived about one hundred years from the time of that council, and ſo perhaps might have had for it ſome antienter authority from ſome now loſt muniments.

"After this eſtabliſhment of parochial right, new arbitrary conveyances out of lands lying in any pariſh were not permitted; but antient conſecrations were ſtill retained, and had confirmation either from preſcription or papal privilege, which were, by the canons, ſufficient titles to be pleaded againſt the common right claimed by pariſh rectors[2]."

The learned Mr. Wharton (chaplain to archbiſhop Sancroft), it muſt be obſerved, was of opinion, that "the payment of tithes had been fully ſettled in the Saxon times; but the Norman Conqueſt, for a time, broke down all order in this kind, and invaded the propriety of the pariſh-prieſts: for the great Normans, in ſharing for themſelves the poſſeſſions of the ancient Engliſh, dealt as rudely with the clergy as with the laity; not only ſeized the lands of manors, biſhopricks, and abbeys (which were ſoon regained by the intereſt of Norman biſhops[3] and abbots advanced to thoſe dignities), but alſo uſurped to themſelves the tithes of the parochial clergy, as appendices of their manors and poſſeſſions in thoſe places, or refuſed to pay tithes of their ſeveral manors; but detained them with a high hand; gave them away to their ſervants or dependants; gave them in dowry with their daughters; or diſpoſed of them as they thought fit; acknowledged indeed all this while that they of right belonged to God and his church; but contented themſelves and their conſciences, either with a vow of entering into the holy war, or with a charge given to their heirs upon their death-beds to reſtore the patrimony of the church detained by them; which heirs, in like manner, ſatisfied themſelves with a like vow or charge given to their heirs. Or, if any of thoſe Normans had better conſcience and more devotion than the reſt, they ſtill thought it ſufficient to give the tithes detained by them, either to ſome clerk or perſon in holy orders related to them, or depending on them[4]; or to ſettle them on ſome monaſtery, or other religious foundation; and this either in whole or in part; and would change, and transfer, or revoke their gifts as they pleaſed[5]. All which they continued to do for ſome time, notwithſtanding the many canons and laws made againſt all or any of theſe practices in favour of the church." We muſt add, however, that he has produced no proof of any of theſe aſſertions; and yet he ſays, "This is a full anſwer to all the authorities and inſtances concerning the arbitrary and irregular donations of tithes made in thoſe days, which Selden hath introduced in his Hiſtory of Tithes, as if they had been the firſt donations of them to the church, and not rather imperfect reſtitutions of them." The reader will, we apprehend, on the contrary, be rather of opinion, that it is a full confirmation of them[6].

Burton, p. 33, under Barwell, ſays, "This manor (long before the Conqueſt) was antient demeſne[7], as it appeareth by the Book of Domeſday, and is there called Beryall." From this paſſage it ſeems probable that Burton had never ſeen Domeſday Book.

All who held under the immediate title of Terra Regis were the ordinary tenants of the king's demeſnes; and where it is ſaid the king held ſuch a vill, &c. he held it in his own hands, and managed it by his præpoſitus or bailiff; and ſo of the other great tenants in capite, where it is ſaid they held ſuch a vill, &c. without mentioning any of their under tenants, they held by a præpoſitus, and their land is ſaid to be in dominico, i. e. in demeſne[8].

Hugh, the ſon of Baldwin, held the manors of Herſtan and Broctone in farm under the king (ad firmam de rege); and Humphrey, the chamberlain, held in farm two ploughlands of the king's fee in Abegrave[9].

In Scerneford, Niwebold, Brocardeſcote, &c. lands were held de feudo reginæ[10].

After the enumeration of the lands of Robert de Todeni, p. 231. a. col. 1. and again under thoſe held by Saxi under the earl of Mellent, p. 232, b. col. 1. it follows, & potuit ire quò voluit[11]; a phraſe equivalent to et liber fuit. Perſons under this deſcription were attached to no lord in a ſeignorial, but to the king alone in a political capicity. They might remove to any other part of the kingdom without alienating the poſſeſſions they quitted; or they were at liberty to part with their land, or put themſelves and their property under a different ſeignorial protection. This was termed commendare ſe, to recommend or ſubmit themſelves to ſuch a protection.

At Eſſeberie, p. 236. b. 2. lands were held of the king for his protection (in commendatione).

Tedingeſworde, p. 237. a. 1. was in diſpute with the king, or claimed by him (in calumniâ regis).

In lands at Aileſton, held alſo of the earl of Mellent by Saxi, and by him again demiſed to Lewin, p. 231, b. 1. there were ſix ploughs held under ſuch a mixed ſort of tenure, that de quatuor ex his poterat facere quod volebat; de duabus non ita. At the end of the lordſhips belonging to Robert de Buci, p. 234. a. 1. it is ſtated that thoſe who held theſe lands in the time of king Edward might remove whitherſoever they pleaſed without alienating; one, named Seric, excepted, who held three ploughlands in Ragendal; ſed non poterat cum eâ alicubi recedere.

[1] They often paid tithes to the place they had a mind to be buried at; and ſuch had been the cuſtom to pay them where they pleaſed, that pope Innocent, 1199, wrote to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, "ut eccleſiis parochialibus juſtæ decimæ perſolvantur." Dugdale, Warw. p. 11.—Notwithſtanding his holineſs's letter and his grace's interference, the order has not been obſerved in all places; for there are frequent inſtances of lands being ſituated in one pariſh, which are now rated in the books of another, to the parſon or impropriator of which the tithes of thoſe lands are alſo paid. In the maps of counties we often ſee large portions of land laying in one, and belonging to another county.

[3] Thus the church of Lincoln obtained from Robert Boſſu earl of Leiceſter ten burgeſſes within the walls of Leiceſter, as a ſatisfaction for wrongs done to the church by himſelf or his predeceſſors. See Appendix to the Town of Leiceſter, p. 15.

[4] It remaineth upon record, that lands at Cunſton, in the county of Leiceſter, were given by king Henry II. to Aylene Pauke, to hold in capite, by the ſervice of ſaying the Pater noſter five times daily; and a poor widow woman, quædam vidua paupercula, held a meſſuage on the ſervice of ſaying alſo daily the Pater noſter five times. Robert le Stepe held another meſſuage there by the ſervice of a pair of white gloves. See the Teſta de Nevill for Leiceſterſhire, p. xlviii. By inquiſition 27 Edward III. it appears that Thomas Winchard held Pauke's land under its original tenure. Camden's Remains, 7th edit. p. 170.

[6] It ſeems Mr. Wharton did not reliſh Selden's Hiſtory of Tithes; and yet he muſt undoubtedly have read the book Dr. Johnſon ſpeaks highly of, preferring it to all the books in Ana, Selden's Table-Talk; where this truly great man ſays, "They conſulted in Oxford, where they might find the beſt argument for their tithes, ſetting aſide the Jus divinum; they were adviſed to my Hiſtory of Tithes; a book ſo much cried down by them formerly (in which I dare boldly ſay, there are more arguments for them than are extant together any where): upon which one writ me word, that my Hiſtory of Tithes was become Peleus's Haſta, to wound and to heal; I told him in my anſwer, I thought I could fit him with a better inſtance. 'Twas poſſible it might undergo the ſame fate that Ariſtotle, Avicen, and Averroes, did in France ſome five hundred years ago; which were excommunicated by Stephen biſhop of Paris (by that very name excommunicated), becauſe that kind of learning puzzled and troubled their divinity. But finding themſelves at a loſs ſome forty years after (which is much about the time ſince I writ my Hiſtory), they were called in again, and ſo have continued ever ſince."

[10] P. 232. a. 1.

[11] Thus in Dorſetſhire, under Cnolle, "Unus tainue tenuit T. R. E. & liber erat cum hac terra;" and in Exeter Domeſday Book, "Dodo tenuit Medeſham T. R. E. & potuit ire cum terra ſua ad quemlibet dominum." So could Saul at Hame.

At Bottesford, p. 234. a. 1. after ſeveral deſcriptions of perſons have been enumerated, with their poſſeſſions, it is added, Aliqui nil habent; that is, probably, they had no part of the lands, they held, in tillage.

At four places in this county, there appear to have been ſomewhat like a diſputed title to the lordſhips. The manor of Burſtall was held by Alwin Phocheſtan[1]; but Hugo de Grentemaiſnell ſaid, the king had given it to him; p. 232. a. 2. The ſame Hugo held Thurmaſton alſo as one manor; but the jury of the county denied it (ſed ſcira negat)[2]; ibid. Houghton, held by earl Wallef, was claimed by the counteſs Judith; p. 233. a. 2. And Sacreſtan, held by Robert Deſpenſer, was claimed by Henry de Fereires; p. 234. b. 2.

All landholders were not diſpoſſeſſed at the Conqueſt. Under Worceſterſhire pater ejus tenuit occurs.

At Wimeſwold, p. 233. a. 1. two brothers had held the land as two manors; but one of them bought the other's part in the time of king Edward, and made one manor of the two.

Where land is ſurveyed in different parcels, there were ſo many manors as anſwered thoſe parcels. And it is matter of ſurprize often to find that great men have very ſmall parcels of land of little value at a great diſtance from their other lands. Perhaps they wanted information of their real worth, when they petitioned for, or accepted of them; or they might think ſome little things convenient or improveable; or afterwards they might ſerve to gratify ſome of their little retainers with what was not worth their own keeping[3]. It appears from ſome writers or old deeds, that this was occaſionally for the ſake of fiſhing amid ſome royalty on river ſides.

Tainland or Teinland was land held by thanes by inheritance, and not charged with ſervice[4].

Teini or Thanes [Sax. Ðeᵹn], called in Latin miniſtri Regis, were the Saxon nobility[5], the chief of whom were the king's feudal thanes, or tenants in grand ſerjeanty. In Berkſhire Domeſday we have Thanus vel miles regis dominicus. Theſe milites held by knight's ſervice, to attend the king in his wars, being moſtly ſoldiers, and frequently had other milites under them, who were alſo called liberi homines regis, thani liberi, and liberi & legales homines (perſons poſſeſſed of lands or tenements in their own demeſne); and were ſaid to hold liberè, in oppoſition to the ſervile tenures of the villans, &c. They were divided into thani Regis mediocres & inferiores. The firſt in the Saxon times were equal to the barons in the Norman, as the thani mediocres were the leſſer barons or lords of manors, and the inferiores made up the loweſt degree of freeholders[6]. Thanes are rarely noticed in Leiceſterſhire; yet three occur under Gutmundeſlea, p. 236. a. 1. tres taini liberè tenuerunt; five others under Scalford, p. 236. b. 1; and five at Lucteburg, p. 237. a. 1.

Nineteen different perſons occur in this county under the title of knights (milites); and we have a diſtinct head of Servientes Regis[7], p. 236. b. 2.

The homines, ſimply expreſſed, are homagers to the lord[8]. We find a ſeparate title of Terra hominum comitis de Mellent, p. 237. a. 2. Under Waletone, p. 231. b. 2. Harding is mentioned cum hominibus ſuis; under Withcote, p. 236. b. 2. are the homines Goisfridi; and under Hadre, p. 236. a. 2. is Shern, unus liber homo.

It is ſaid in this ſurvey, that Hugo de Grenteſmaiſnell had 24 burgeſſes in Leiceſter, who belonged to Hanſtigie, and 13 belonging to Sigleſbie (p. 230. a. 1.); that the biſhop of Lincoln had 17 burgeſſes in Leiceſter (p. 230. b. 2.); that 9 burgeſſes in the City [of Leiceſter] had two ploughs at Pontenei, which was held by Ralph under the biſhop (p. 231. a. 1.); and that there was one burgeſs in Leiceſter, who belonged to the manor of Erendeſbi (p. 235. a. 2.). And all this cannot, we apprehend, be better explained than in the words of Blackſtone[9]: "Tenure in burgage is deſcribed by Glanvil[10], and is expreſsly ſaid by Littleton[11] to be but tenure in ſocage; and it is where the king or other perſon is lord of an antient borough, in which the tenements are held by a rent certain. It is indeed only a kind of town ſocage; as common ſocage, by which other lands are holden, is uſually of a rural nature. A borough is diſtinguiſhed from other towns by the right of ſending members to parliament; and, where the right of election is by burgage tenure, that alone is a proof of the antiquity of the borough. Tenure in burgage therefore, or burgage tenure, is where houſes, or lands which were formerly the ſite of houſes in an antient borough, are held of ſome lord in common ſocage by a certain eſtabliſhed rent. And theſe ſeem to have withſtood the ſhock of the Norman Conqueror's encroachments, principally on account of their inſignificancy, which made it not worth while to compel them to an alteration of tenure, as 100 of them put together would ſcarce have amounted to a knight's fee. Beſides, the owners of them, being chiefly artificers and perſons engaged in trade, could not with any tolerable propriety be put on ſuch a military eſtabliſhment as the tenure in chivalry was. The free ſocage, therefore, in which theſe tenements were held, ſeems to be plainly a remnant of Saxon liberty; which may alſo account for the great variety of cuſtoms affecting many of their tenants ſo held in antient burgage."

Terra is always underſtood to mean arable land, in contradiſtinction to paſture, meadow, wood, &c. whoſe contents are not expreſſed in hides, but in leucæ, quadragenariæ, &c. which were not charged with the tax of Dane-geld, or conſidered as part of the geldable or arable land[12]. The number of hides is ſaid in ſome few eſtates not to be known, and that they never paid Dane-geld, thoſe lands probably not having been converted to tillage before Ethelred's time; but in general the number of hides belonging to the king and queen and their tenants are enumerated as well as thoſe of their other ſubjects[13].

There are ſome inſtances wherein the value of the land decreaſed between the two ſurveys, and one inſtance occurs in Dorſetſhire of concealment[14].

The general face of the county at this time was divided into arable, expreſſed by the carucates and the number of carucæ, or ploughs, meadow [pratum], paſturage [paſtura], and woodland [ſilva][15].

In this part of the ſurvey the Woods are frequently, perhaps always, taken into the account; not that the timber was at that time of great value, but principally on account of the acorns and beech-maſt, which, when the country was in a very imperfect ſtate of cultivation, had a degree of importance, of which we can form a very inadequate idea at this time. Our hogs are reared with whey or with milk, with the refuſe of our gardens, with grains, and the waſh of our kitchens, and they are fed with potatoes, or with barley-flour: but the hogs of thoſe times were generally kept in the woods, and it is probable were always fatted there[1]. In many places of this ſurvey, and once in this county under Aſcebi[2], the value of a wood is aſcertained by the number of hogs it would ſupport. Pic-bꞃed (porcellorum panis) is one of the Saxon words for acorn[3]; and it was in a great meaſure for the ſake of a food of ſuch importance to them, that new ſevere laws were made by our Saxon anceſtors for the preſervation of timber[4]. They even eſtimated the value of a tree by the number of hogs that could lie under it: "Arborem cujus rami 30 porcis umbraculo eſſe poſſent proſtraviſſe convictus 60 ſolidis noxiam ſarcito[5]." The fines for treſpaſſes in woods were not trivial: "Si quis in querceto ſuo porcos glandes devorantes (bonâ veniâ domini non prius conceſſâ) invenerit, pigneretur primo quod ſex ſolidorum æſtimabitur. Et ſi illuc jam primo ingreſſi ſunt porci, damnum ſolido uno dominus reſarcito, & præterea (pro eo ac fuerit æſtimatio porcorum) confirmato non intrâſſe ſæpius: ſin ſæpius irrupiſſe conſtabit, duos ſolidos pendito[6]. Qui nemori alterius flammam injecerit, aut citra bonam domini veniam ſylvam alterius ceciderit, pro quâque arbore majori quinque ſolvat ſolidos, & pro ſingulis quibuſque minoribus denarios quinque, ac præterea 30 ſolidis mulctator[7]."

[2] In other places it is ſaid, hoc atteſtatur totus comitatus, and ſicut ſcira dicit, both which phraſes mean the jury empanneled from the body of the county; elſewhere called meliores homines totius comitatus; which jury heard and determined all diſputes. The form of their inquiſition may be ſeen in the Cotton Library, Tib. A. VI. Inquiſitio per ſacramentum vicecomitis ſcire & omnium baronum & eorum francigenarum & totius comitatus. It concludes thus, & alii omnes Franci & Angli de hoc hundredo juraverunt.

[15] Tillage land is commonly meaſured by carucates; a farm of tillage and paſture by hides; and meadow by acres. Dr. Naſh.

The laws of Hoel Dha, which were written not long before the time of this ſurvey, ſeem to have been made with the ſame view: "Pretium quercûs cxx denarii.—Rami tranſverſi e mediâ arbore provenientes xxx denarios ſinguli valent.—Ob quercum perforatam xxiv denarii debentur poſſeſſori ſilvæ & multa privata regi.—Coryletum xxiv denarios valet. Quævis alia arbor fructuoſa ejuſdem erit pretii ac coryletum, quercu & pomo exceptis.—Arbor quælibet infructuoſa iv denarios valet, fraxinus v gr. vel alnus, vel ſalix[8]."

Even the terms on which hogs might be agiſted are ſettled in the Saxon laws: "Qui volens porcos ſaginandi gratiâ ad glandes devorandas in quercetum admiſerit ſuum, ex iis qui ad trium digitorum latitudinem pingueverint, ſumito ſibi tertium quemque: ex iis qui ad duorum digitorum craſſitudinem ſaginati fuerint, quartum; ex iis qui ad pollicis latitudinem excreverint pinguedine, quini ſinguli ſui ſunto[9]." Hence we have good reaſon to conclude, that the donation decimarum pannagii[10], made by the old barons to the religious houſes they favoured, were extremely acceptable.

A wood that yielded neither acorns nor beach-maſt is in this (under Lupeſtor, p. 235. a. 2.) and other parts of the ſurvey, called "ſilva infructuoſa," as affording nothing that would, comparatively ſpeaking, be an object of attention.

Under the article of woods, we find ſpinetum[11] at Dalbi, p. 235, a. 1. for a ſpinney, or young plantation.

At Noſeley, p. 232, a. 2. were 20 acres of bruſhwood (broce); and ſee under Aileſtone, p. 237. a. 2.

The firſt general diviſions of this county in the ſurvey were into hundreds, or, as they are ſtyled in Leiceſterſhire, wapentakes; a term which has been thus explained: "In conſiliis rex vel princeps, prout ætas cuique, prout nobilitas, prout decus bellorum, prout facundia eſt, audiuntur, auctoritate ſuadendi magis quam jubendi poteſtate. Si diſplicuit ſententia, fremitu aſpernantur. Sin placuit, frameas concutiunt. Honoratiſſimum aſſenſus genus eſt armis laudare. Hinc forſitan wapentachiorum vetuſtum jus[12]. Obſerva takan in Argenteo codice paſſim accipi pro tangere, attingere; adeo ut Angli non modo ſuum take, verum etiam touch ab hoc verbo etiamnum retinuerint[13]."

With this laſt ſenſe agrees the etymology of the word wapentake in the laws of Edward the Confeſſor: "Quod Angli vocant hundredum ſupradicti comitatus (Yorkſhire[14], Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Leiceſterſhire, and Northamptonſhire), vocant wapentachium. Et non ſine cauſâ: cum quis enim accipiebat præfecturam wapentachii, die ſtatuto in loco ubi conſueverant congregari, omnes majores natu contra (verſus) eum conveniebant, & deſcendenti eo de equo ſuo omnes aſſurgebant ei. Ipſe vero erectâ lanceâ ſuâ ab omnibus ſecundum morem fœdus accipiebat. Omnes enim quotquot veniſſent cum lanceis ſuis ipſius haſtam tangebant, & ita ſe confirmabant per contactum armorum, pace palam conceſſâ. Anglicè enim arma vocantur wæpnu, & taccare confirmare; quaſi armorum confirmatio, vel ut magis expreſſe ſecundum linguam Anglicam dicamus wapentac, armorum tactus eſt. Wæpnu enim arma ſonat, tac tactus eſt. Quamobrem poteſt cognoſci, quod hac de cauſâ totus ille conventus dicitur wapentac, eo quod per tactum armorum ſuorum ad invicem confederati ſunt[15]."

The reader will probably think it ſomewhat extraordinary, that, notwithſtanding what is ſaid above, the word wapentake never once occurs in Warwickſhire; that in Northamptonſhire there are only two wapentakes, and that even thoſe two are ſometimes called hundreds; and that though there are many wapentakes in Lincolnſhire, there are alſo ſome hundreds.

Dr. Gilbert Stuart ſeems to have diſcovered in Tacitus the true origin of the word hundred: "Definitur & numerus. Centeni ex ſingulis pagis ſunt, idque ipſum inter ſuos vocantur, & quod primo numerus fuit, jam nomen & honor eſt[16]." The pagus or diſtrict furniſhed an hundred warriors.

In many caſes the Servus ſeems to have been like a bailiff, or ſteward, to direct the reſt of the tenants, farmers, and labourers. There is frequently no more than one at a place, and he is then always named before the villani and bordarii.

The Servi among the ancient Germans or Saxons were of the kind called prædiales, who, without any determined tenure of land, were at the arbitrary pleaſure of their lord appointed to ſervile works, and received their wages and maintenance at the diſcretion of the lord. In our tranſlation of the record they are called bondmen[17]; and the Ancillæ, who appear to have been women-ſervants under circumſtances nearly ſimilar, bondwomen[18].

We have the authority of Bracton[19] for aſſerting, that, however unhappy the condition of the ſervi of thoſe times was in other reſpects, yet their lives and their limbs were under the protection of the laws; ſo that, if the maſter killed his bondman, he was ſubject to the ſame puniſhment as if he had killed any other perſon. The laws in like manner protected the chaſtity of the Ancillæ; they could not be violated even by their owners with impunity.

The monks were forbid by an antient canon to manumiſe their ſlaves: "Abbati vel monacho non licet facere liberum; impium eſt, qui res eccleſiæ non contulerit, dampnum inferat." And this unhappy race of men ſeems to have been longer perpetuated on the eſtates of the monaſteries than elſewhere[1]; for, in the ſurvey of Glaſtonbury, taken after its diſſolution, there is mention of "271 bondmen, whoſe bodies and goods are at the king's highneſs's pleaſure[2]."

The Coliberti were a middle rank between Servi and Liberi, doing the work of the firſt, but holding by the tenure of the laſt. They were tenants in ſocage, and manumitted villans, but not abſolutely free[3]. No perſons of this deſcription occur in Leiceſterſhire; nor are there any of the Cotarii, or cottagers, who paid a certain rent for very ſmall parcels of land, ſuch as gardens. Theſe latter occur in Dorſetſhire under the name of Coſcet or Coſcez[4].

Radmanni[5], the "liberi tenentes, qui arabant & herciabant ad curiam domini, ſeu falcabant aut metebant[6]," are entirely unnoticed in Leiceſterſhire.

The Bordarii have received, at various times, a great variety of interpretation. By lord Coke they are called boors or huſbandmen; by Spelman, cottagers who reſided on the borders of the village. Brady ſays, "they were drudges, and performed vile ſervices, which were reſerved by the lord upon a poor little houſe, and a ſmall parcel of land, and might perhaps be domeſtic works, ſuch as grinding, threſhing, drawing water, cutting wood," &c. Mr. Cunningham, that "they are by ſome eſteemed to be born huſbandmen, or cottagers;" Mr. Wyndham, "that the name ſeems to indicate an obligation to ſupply the lord with proviſions of ſome kind or other."

Mr. Cowell diſtinguiſhed them from the ſervi and villani, as of a leſs ſervile condition, who had a bord or cottage, with a ſmall parcel of land, allowed them.

An anonymous writer obſerves, that "the demeſnes were ſometimes greatly too extenſive, and too much intermixed with other lands that were remote from the manſion-houſe; for, they were not always laid out like a park, nor had every lord ſuch a predilection for huſbandry. Care was uſually taken to reſerve a ſufficient quantity of land, ſo as amply to ſupply the houſe with proviſions, out of which very conſiderable portions were not unfrequently let off to tenants at an annual rent, and were then, agreeable to their original appropriation, ſtyled bordlands, the occupiers bordarii, and the rents bordland rents, and ſometimes table rents; for, whether we conſtrue the Saxon bord, or bordè, by domus with ſome, or by menſa with others, is not very material, ſince to ſupply the houſe or the table with proviſions conveys preciſely the ſame idea." From the various opinions already cited, "confuſed and deſultory as they are, it ſeems pretty evident, that the bordarii occupied a part of the lord's demeſnes purpoſely reſerved to furniſh proviſions for his houſe. But, as ſome of the barons then lived as luxuriouſly as they now do, it is not eaſily to be believed that a little poultry, or a few eggs, would add much to the ſplendor of their entertainments; or that ſuch large eſtates as the bordarii occupied (which muſt occur to every one who has but juſt looked into Domeſday) would have been granted to them for ſuch a very inconſiderable return. I have ſome minutes of a rather extraordinary ſuit, inſtituted in the reign of queen Elizabeth, by a leſſee under the crown, to recover the demeſnes from the copyholders, who, it was ſuppoſed, had unjuſtly uſurped them. The defendants pleaded, that the lands, which he ſtyled demeſnes, had always been called and known by the name of bordlands; and that the demeſnes, properly ſo called, were in leaſe to others. This cauſe was tried firſt at Niſi Prius, where the defendants gained a verdict. It was then removed into the Exchequer, where judgement was alſo given in favour of the copyholders. Still diſſatisfied, the leſſee had the reſolution and addreſs to bring it before her majeſty in council, where the whole underwent a minute reviſion, before ſir William Cecil, lord Burleigh, ſir Walter Mildmay, ſir Roger Manwood, chief baron, and the reſt of the barons, who paſſed a decree in favour of the copyhold tenants, in which the leaſe granted by her majeſty was declared to be void; 'for that the bordlands, though antiently demeſne, had been divided among the copyholders, and had, for the laſt 60 years, been granted by copies of court-rolls together with their antient copyholds[7].' From the preceding opinions and circumſtances, I have been led to conclude, that the bordarii were not of that inferior caſt which moſt writers ſuppoſe, and far removed from that diſreſpectable claſs in which they are uſually ranked[8]. In my humble opinion, they appear to have been huſbandmen or farmers who occupied part of the lord's demeſnes, and paid their rent (reditus or return) principally, if not entirely, in proviſions; but were of ſomewhat leſs elevated rank than the villani[9]."

Villa, in Domeſday-book, ſignifies a manor[10], lordſhip, or ſingle hamlet[11], two or more of which were uſually united to form a villata, though in ſome few caſes a villa was ſufficiently large to ſtand ſingle, when it was ſaid to anſwer pro villa integrâ; and when two were joined together, each was called dimidia villatæ[1].

[6] Tenants of this deſcription will be found, however, under our account of the Abbey of Leiceſter.

[7] The principal plea alleged by the appellant was, that demeſne lands were not demiſable by copy of court-roll. But Manwood and the other barons overruled it, by obſerving, that "the allegation of the ſaid bordlands, otherwiſe demeſne lands, not to be demiſable by copy, was untrue, for the name of demeſne lands is not any proof thereof; becauſe all cuſtomary and copyhold lands were ſometimes demeſne lands, and may retain the name of demeſne lands, and nevertheleſs be in truth cuſtomary and copyhold lands." I was favoured with a ſight of the decree, which is long, as it recites the whole proceedings from the commencement of the ſuit, which laſted ſeven years; and I could not help remarking, that the phraſe "Bordlands, otherwiſe demeſne lands," runs all through it. Theſe bordlands (to which extenſive rights of common belong) were almoſt 500 acres, and lay diſperſed in ſmall parcels, over ſeveral large common fields and meadows, that are ſtill unincloſed. In the reign of king Edward I, before they were granted by copy, they were let to various tenants for about £.12. a year; they are now worth £.100. a-year. One eſtate, containing $46\frac{1}{2}$ acres, was then valued at 14*s.* $2\frac{3}{4}$d. a-year; it is now worth ſo much per acre. The meadow was valued at 1*s.* an acre; and now it lets for 40.—The demeſne (properly ſo called) ſtill granted by leaſe for lives, are worth but little more than one-third of the bordlands, and, like them, were laid out in a very disjointed or unconnected manner, and, what is not a little remarkable, with a redundant portion of the leaſt fertile land in the pariſh. Taking the demeſnes and bordlands together at 550*l.* a-year, ſuch an appropriation for proviſions muſt have been conſidered as ſomething handſome: for, as the lands always were and ſtill are open in common, no partial improvement worth notice can have taken place; conſequently no objection can be made to my uſing the preſent inſtead of the antient valuation, ſince the proportional values, compared with the produce, would in fact amount to the ſame. I would juſt beg leave to add, that the lands in this manor which are granted by copies of court-roll (excluſive of the demeſnes and bordlands) are computed to be worth 1000*l.* a-year, provided they were let at an annual rent. The proprietor of theſe eſtates, who is deſcended from an antient and noble family, has two other manors in the ſame county, where the demeſnes were laid out in the ſame intermixed ſtate, and with an adequate ſhare of the poor lands; and as my reſearches and enquiries have been extended to ſome other manors, I think that the additions made to Cowell (edit. 1701, voc. Inland, by which he meant the demeſnes) ſeem to have been written with too little knowledge of the ſubject; the author ſays, "it was that which lay next or moſt convenient for the lord's manſion-houſe, as within view thereof: and therefore they kept that part in their own hands for ſupportation of the family and hoſpitality."

[8] In extracts from Domeſday, in Kelham, p. 164, mention is made of bordars who have no land of their own, but are reſident on twenty acres, part of the land before mentioned; and of 480 bordars, who, on account of their poverty, pay no cuſtomary taxes: hence it appears that they were of different deſcriptions; though ſome occupied farms, others were of the condition of our pooreſt day-labourers.

Manerium autem fieri poterit ex pluribus villis vel unâ. Plures enim villæ poſſint eſſe in corpore manerii ſicut & una; & ad unam manſionem pertinere poterint plura tenementa." Bracton, cap. 28. p. 434.

[11] Hamel, or hamleta, is a ſubdiviſion mentioned in the Statute of Exeter, 14 Edw. I; requiring the names de toutes les villes & hamlets qui ſont en ſon wapentake, hundred, ou franchiſe; and the attendance of eight men from each ville entiere, ſix from each demie ville, and four from each hamlette. Entire villages ſir Henry Spelman, in his excellent Gloſſary, conjectures to have conſiſted of ten freemen or frankpledges, demi-villages of five, and hamlets of leſs than five. Blackſtone, Introd. § 4. I. 115.

The Villani, often named in this ſurvey, having their name de villis becauſe they had fermes[2], were the lord's tenants of a ſomewhat ſuperior order; but burthened with ſuch ſtated ſervile works as had been annexed to their lands and tenements[3].

Some judgement may be formed of their condition by a reference to Plac. coram Rege apud Porteſmuth, Trin. 7 John, Rot. 6. where the abbot of Waltham maintains, "that John le Tanur is his villan, having been purchaſed by Walter his predeceſſor for ſixty ſhillings." In another caſe, "Defend' dicit, quod non debet facere dotem, &c. quia ipſe tenet in villenagio ad furcam & flagellum[4] de domino ſuo, Rico de Canvill[5]. And, in a third inſtance, "Juratores dicunt, quod Thomas de Routhelaund eſt villanus Johannis Folyott, & quod ipſum poſſet talliare de alto & baſſo pro voluntate ſuâ; & quod faciet merchetum carnis & ſanguinis[6]." Villani were formerly very common both in England and other countries, and were of two ſorts, Villans regardant and villans in groſs. Villans regardant, in the civil law called vernæ, were ſuch as had long appertained to a manor, the lords whereof had been ſeiſed of them and their anceſtors time out of mind; and they accordingly paſſed with the eſtate in which they were ſettled. A villan in groſs, or at large, was a villan regardant, granted and transferrable from one manor to another; and might be ſold without the eſtate, as ſlaves are at this day. Theſe were the adſcriptitii glebæ, or agri conſiti, often mentioned in the Codes and Digeſts of Juſtinian; they could not leave their lord without his permiſſion; but, if they ran away, or were purloined from him, they might be claimed and recovered by action like beaſts or other chattels. They held incloſed ſmall portions of land by way of ſuſtaining themſelves and families; but it was at the mere will of the lord, who might diſpoſſeſs them whenever he pleaſed; and it was upon villan ſervices, that is, to carry out dung, to hedge and ditch the lord's demeſnes, and any other the meaneſt offices; and their ſervices were not only baſe, but uncertain both as to time and quantity[7]. A villan, in ſhort, was in much the ſame ſtate as lord Moleſworth[8] deſcribes to be that of the boors in Denmark; and Stiernhook[9] the neals or ſlaves in Sweden; which confirms the probability of their being in ſome degree monuments of the Daniſh tyranny. A villan could acquire no property in lands or goods; or, if he purchaſed either, the lord might enter upon them, ouſt the villan, and ſeize them to his own uſe, unleſs he contrived to diſpoſe of them again before the lord had ſecured them; for then the lord had loſt his opportunity[10]. In many places alſo a fine was payable to the lord if the villan preſumed to marry his daughter without leave from his lord[11]. This was a tenure in the manor of Temple Balſall, co. Warwick; and a circumſtance of the lord's leave being aſked for marriage happened within the laſt 20 years; and by the common law the lord might alſo bring an action againſt the huſband for damages in thus purloining his property[12]. For the children of villans were alſo in the ſame ſtate of bondage with their parents; whence they were called in Latin Nativi[13], which gave riſe to the feminine appellation of a villan, who was called a neiſe[14]. "The law protected the perſons of villeins, as the king's ſubjects, againſt atrocious injuries of the lord: for he might not kill or maim his villein, though he might beat him with impunity, ſince the villein had no action or remedy againſt his lord, but in caſe of the murder of his anceſtor, or the maim of his own perſon. Neiſes, indeed, had alſo an appeal of rape in caſe the lord violated them by force[15]."

And here it may not be improper to notice the falſe delicacy of rendering villani "villagers," and ſervi "ſervants[16]." Have we not reaſon to glory in our forefathers having ſhaken off the yoke of vaſſalage[17]? And do the words villagers and ſervants give any adequate idea of the ſtate ninety-nine in a hundred were in at the time immediately ſubſequent to the Norman invaſion? It is evident that the old Norman barons, whoſe deeds in arms were ſolely calculated to preſerve themſelves from tyranny, not to protect the people againſt ſlavery, ranked their villani and ſervi little higher than their hogs, their ploughs, or any other part of their live or dead ſtock; and it muſt be confeſſed, that the Great Charter (which indeed manumitted in ſome degree the principal land-owners[18];

[1] The "Nomina Villarum in comitatu Leiceſtriæ, quæ pro Villatâ in Itinere reſpondent," will be found hereafter among the Introductory Records, p. xlviii.

A Villa was a town of any magnitude: Villata, the people, or rather the chief men or community of the villa. By both was meant an aſſemblage of ordinary people, inhabiting contiguous manſions. (Vide Ingulphi Hiſtoriam, apud. Gall. p. 14 & p. 53; & Dugdale, Mon. I. p. 287; & Fleta, lib. vi. c. 51; & Bracton, fol. 312, 434; & Spelmanni Gloſſarium.) A villa ſingly, if it were conſiderable enough, or, if ſmall, with ſome others adjoining, compoſed a diſtrict or tything. Auxiliar villæ were members or appendages to the chief villa, called the caput. Theſe diſtricts were diviſions of the hundred, as hundreds were diviſions of ſhires or provinces. Each diſtrict was adminiſtered by a reeve and four men; the latter were free tenants, or tenants in villenage, as it happened. They ſeem to have been choſen yearly by the villata; it was their office to ſuperintend weights and meaſures, and aſſize of ale; to apprehend for murder; to let no perſon who was of free condition, but without maſter or property, live in the diſtrict without pledges or bondſmen, who ſhould be reſponſible for his behaviour to the diſtrict, as the diſtrict was to the king, for the good behaviour of all perſons within the ſame. Many other branches of ſubordinate police belonged to the officers and men of the diſtrict. They collected alſo the hidage and other talliages for the king, and compoſed a juriſdiction. When the king's juſtices, or barons, made their iters throughout the realm, the reeve and his four aſſociates of each villa were ſummoned to attend them at the place appointed, and anſwered to ſuch things as the juſtices charged them with. (See Hoveden, pp. 549. 784; & Capitula Itinerum in Cronicis, Fleta, Bracton, &c.; & Spelmanni Gloſſarium in vocibus Taxa, Villata, Decenna, Francipledgium, &c) For neglects charged upon villatæ, and puniſhed, ſee Madox, Hiſt. of Exchequer, in Amerciaments.—Du Cange quotes Fleta, VI. c. 51. ſaying, "villa ex pluribus manſionibus eſt vicinata, & villata ex pluribus vicinis." [4] I very much doubt whether this is to be underſtood ſo rigorouſly as if the lord could hang or flay the villan, and not rather that the villan was to perform the ſervice of upholding gallows and whipping-poſt. Merchetum carnis et ſanguinis is a fleſh-market of cattle, not of men, nor a commutation of capital puniſhments. The famous mercheta mulierum was groſsly miſunderſtood till lord Hailes explained it. [17] What gave the finiſhing ſtroke to ſervitude, were the confuſions occaſioned by the two contending houſes of York and Lancaſter, when the whole kingdom was divided, and every lord obliged, even for his own ſecurity, to take part with one ſide or the other; and, when once engaged, neceſſitated to ſupport his party with his whole force. but left the bulk of the people ſlaves as it found them) conſiders them in the ſame light as mere goods and chattels.

We have obſerved, that there were villans in groſs, and villans regardant; but there muſt likewiſe have been villans of another kind: how elſe can we underſtand one of the laws of William I. which ſays that a villan ſhall pay for his relief "melius animal quod habuerit, ſive equa ſit, ſive bos, ſive vacca[1];" more eſpecially as the ſame law ſays, "& poſtea ſint omnes villani in franco plegio?" Such villans, as lord Lyttelton has juſtly remarked, muſt have been freemen. They muſt have been in a different ſtate from the two other ſpecies of villani, though it may be difficult to determine what it was. It is poſſible they were tenants at the will of their lord; and yet they might have an advantage which the others had not; they might have the land they occupied, though they could not diſpoſe of it; and in this caſe they did not at all differ from tenants at will at this day.

It cannot be ſuppoſed, that perſons in ſuch circumſtances, as the villans in groſs and the villans regardant could ever have been conſidered, in ſuch times, as members of the commonwealth, or as having any other intereſt in the ſtate than the title they had to the protection of their perſons. We may be ſure they had no ſhare in the legiſlature; for, thoſe who enjoy the lands thoſe villans occupied, have none at this time, copyholders not being allowed to vote at the election of members of parliament, not even when their copyholds are at a fine certain; which makes them as independent of their lord as a freehold could have done.

From ſuch an antient houſe, as ſir Edward Coke obſerves[2], though very meanly deſcended, come Copyhold tenures.

It will ſeem very ſurprizing to thoſe who do not conſider the ſpirit of the times, that a law of Edward the Confeſſor ſhould put an equal valuation on the life of a ſocman and a villan; Manbote de villano & ſochmanno 12 oras. But Mr. Dalrymple[3] juſtly attributes this to the contempt which in thoſe martial ages was entertained for every man who was not a ſoldier.

The Socmanni[4] were thoſe inferior land-owners, who had lands in the ſoc or franchiſe of a great baron; privileged villans, who, though their tenures be abſolutely copyhold, yet have an intereſt equal to a freehold; their ſervices were fixed and determinate; they could not be compelled to relinquiſh theſe tenements at their lord's will, nor againſt their own: & ideo, ſays Bracton, denominantur liberi. It ſeems idle to ſuppoſe that they took their name from the ſoca or plough; for it no where appears that they held by plough-ſervice. Such men were actual freeholders, and a certain number of them were neceſſary in every manor to hold the pleas of the manor-court. Socmen were of conſequence thoſe who owed ſuit and ſervice to the lord's court[5]; and it is from the word ſoc, which gave them their name, that we muſt derive our tenures in free and common ſocage.

Many of the lordſhips in this and other counties are ſaid to be held with ſac and ſoc.

Both ſoca and ſaca were conſidered as obſolete words in the time of the Confeſſor, and are thus explained in a charter from him to the abbot of Weſtminſter: "Sokene aver fraunche curt; ſoka, quite de medlee[6]."

Sac was the power and privilege of hearing and determining cauſes and diſputes, levying forfeitures and fines, executing laws, and adminiſtering juſtice within a certain precinct.

Soc was the territory or precinct in which the ſaca and other privileges were exerciſed.

At Walecote, p. 231. a. 1. were four ploughlands held under the biſhop of Lincoln, and ten others which paid a rent (que reddunt ſocam).

At Burtone, p. 237. a. 1. Hugo reclamat terræ ſocam.

Francigena, a general name, ſignifying aliens in contradiſtinction to Engliſhmen, was given by the Engliſh to all ſtrangers, known or unknown, unleſs they could prove themſelves Engliſh. The proof of the latter was, till it was taken away by the Stat. 14 Edward, chap. 4. by Engleſcire or Englecerrie, i. e. the evidence of the parents before the king's juſtices. Canute the Dane, having peaceably ſettled himſelf in the kingdom, at the requeſt of his lords diſcharged his army, upon condition, that whoſoever ſhould kill an alien ſhould be liable to juſtice; and if the manſlayer eſcaped, the town where the man was killed ſhould forfeit 66 marcs to the king; but, if it was not able to pay the fine, it ſhould be levied on the hundred: and farther, that every man murthered ſhould be counted francigena, except before the coroner he could be proved to be an Engliſhman.

In this record, Francigenæ were in general Norman ſub-tenants, under the followers of the Conqueror, who had lordſhips aſſigned to them.

There were ſixty-one in the different parts of Leiceſterſhire; nine of whom, in Wimundewalle, p. 233. a. 1, were Francigenæ ſervientes.

Though ſurnames were not very common at the period of the ſurvey, we find ſeveral in this county. Amongſt theſe the Burdetts (anceſtors of the preſent ſir Robert Burdett, of Foremark, in Derbyſhire) are particularly to be noticed.

Hugo Burdett, as a ſub-tenant, held Rereſbi, p. 236. a. 2; and Gloweſbi, p. 236. b. 1.

Radeclive, p. 234. b. 1. was held by the wife of Robert Burdett; whoſe ſon poſſeſſed property at Branteſtone, p. 232. b. 1; and at Galbi, p. 232. b. 2.

William Peverel, William Loveth, Goisfrid Alſclin, Durand Malet, Ralph Camit, Hugo Muſard, Ralph Framen, Adam Pbeceſtan, and Ralph Pipin, occur in other parts of the county.

Robert Diſpenſer (Diſpenſator), Robert Uſher (Hoſtiarius), and Humfrid Chamberlain (Camerarius), are names derived from office.

The meaſures in this ſurvey are,

1. The hide, manſe[7], or family of the Saxons. Agriculture is the foundation of towns, pariſhes, and of the whole kingdom; and hence all meaſures have been taken from the earlieſt antiquity.

The hide is eſteemed to contain 100 acres[8], and ſometimes 120[9]; but both certainly differed according to the lightneſs or ſtiffneſs of the ſoil, whereof a plough might diſpatch more or leſs[10]. Some hides even conſiſted of 240 acres[11]. Selden, in his notes upon Hengham, proves the hide conſiſted of that number till 9 Rich. I. when in the five-ſhilling aid it was fixed at 100 acres, perhaps the common hundred, which was 120 acres[1]; yet, in his Titles of Honor, p. 622, he ſays, the juſt value of a hide that might fit the whole kingdom never appears in Domeſday, and was ever of an uncertain quantity. From this ſurvey of Leiceſterſhire it is evident that it was not certain even in a ſingle county.

[5] The Radcheniſters, mentioned in p. xxxvii, but of which none occur in this county, were a ſpecies of ſocmen. What degree of freedom they enjoyed is not now diſcoverable: it is not improbable, however, they might be ſervi, who had redeemed themſelves with money; I am led to conjecture ſo from the French word, whence Radcheniſter is derived, viz. racheter, which is the ſame with the Latin one, redimere, to ranſom or redeem. Warner's Gloſſary.

Radcheniſters were a kind of ſocmen, ſome being leſs free than others. There are 19 freemen radcheniſters, who have 48 carucates with their men.—Six radcheniſters, who could not be ſeparated from the manor.—Theſe radcheniſters ploughed and harrowed at the lord's manor. [6] In the Quo Warranto Roll, North'ton, 3 Edw. III. they are explained in manner following: "Dicit quod ratione de Sok intendit habere ſectam omnium tenentium ſuorum tam liberorum quam villanorum; et ratione de Sak intendit habere emend' omnium delictorum." Richard I. in a charter to the abbot of St. Alban's, recited in the Quo Warranto Roll, Kent, 21 Edw. Roger himſelf holds Saltby. There are two hides and three carucates of land. In the time of king Edward there were 28 ploughs. Land of Roger de Buſli; p. 234. b. 2.

William Peverel holds of the king Foſton. There is half a hide. It is land for 5 ploughs; p. 235. a. 2.

Oger the Briton holds of the king, in Kilby, two parts of one hide, that is, twelve carucates of land. There were 8 ploughs; p. 236. a. 1.

William holds of the earl of Mellent half a hide and one carucate and a half of land in Blaby. There were 9 ploughs under the ſame earl.

Robert holds in Brandineſtor two parts of one hide, that is, 12 ploughlands; p. 237. a. 2.

At Melton, p. 235. b. 1. every hide contained xiv carucates and a half; at Knighton, p. 232. a. 1. two parts of one hide are mentioned, without explanation.

Mr. Agarde thinks the carucate when mentioned alone was equal to the hide; but when mentioned with the hide, as in Dorſetſhire, it contained only about 60 acres[2]. Yet he was himſelf unable to reduce the queſtion of meaſurement of land to any certainty[3].

The hide was the meaſure of land in the Confeſſor's reign, the carucate that to which it was reduced by the Conqueror's new ſtandard. Thus every place is ſaid to have paid geld for ſo many hides T. R. E. and then follows its preſent meaſure of ſo many carucates; eſt ix carucatarum[4].

The carucate of the Normans is what we call a plough-land[5], as much arable as could be tilled and managed by one caruca[6], or plough, and the beaſts belonging thereto, in a year; having meadow, paſture, and houſes, for the houſeholders and cattle belonging to it[7]. This is the great meaſure of Domeſday-book in moſt counties; for, in thoſe of Nottingham, Derby, and Lincoln, only carucates are mentioned.

In Leiceſterſhire we have both hides and carucates.

At Sadington, p. 230. b. 1. "Eſt i hida i carucata minus;" and at Shepeſhed, p. 230. b. 2. "Godvin ten' de rege in feudo ii hid' & dim' & iv car' terræ."

The meaſurement of the carucata is ſomewhat arbitrary, and differs conſiderably, not only in different counties, but even in different diſtricts of the ſame county. In ſome pariſhes it is no more than 100 acres; while in others it may be 140[8].

It ſeems clear that the commiſſioners in the ſurvey of this county (whatever may have been the caſe elſewhere) have, from the conviction that hides and carucates were of no certain meaſure, and that they differed ſtill more in quality than they did in meaſure, adopted the very rational mode of determining the value of the land by the number of ploughs that were actually employed, or, in their judgement, might be employed on it. We ſometimes find, that the number of ploughlands is the ſame with the number of ploughs at that time in actual employment; but much oftener, that the number of ploughs is conſiderably leſs than the number of ploughlands; and ſometimes the commiſſioners tell us, that the land would admit of more ploughs than were then in actual uſe. And it is but reaſonable to conclude, that certain lands had been in a better ſtate in the time of king Edward than they were in the reign of William I. from their having more ploughs at work on them; and, on the contrary, that other lands were much improved at the time of the ſurvey, as they had more ploughs at work than had been employed in the days of the Confeſſor. There are few paſſages in the ſurvey of this county that can be made intelligible in any other way of interpretation.

After comparing the antient and modern meaſures, and how many carucates were royal demeſne, the record ſtates how many carucæ were employed on each parcel of land. But we are not always to conclude that there were as many ploughs on it as it was capable of working. In ſome inſtances there were more, and we find it obſerved that the land was half a carucate, and yet there was one plough on it; and that though the land was but one carucate and a half, tamen ibi ſunt ii carucæ; and under Croxton, p. 230. a. 2. two ploughs and a half to two carucates; that is, there was arable land enough to employ two ploughs and half a third[9]. Where Exchequer Domeſday ſays terra eſt i car. et dimid. Exeter Domeſday has poteſt arari cum caruca & dimidia.

We ſhall ſoon ſee what ſtrange inconſiſtencies have ariſen from the ſuppoſition, that the abbreviation car. always means carucata terræ. "Terra eſt 40 carucatæ. In dominio ſunt 6 carucatæ & 24 ſervi & 13 porcarii. Ibi 15 villani & 8 cozets & 14 coliberti, cum 36 carucatis," (Wiltſhire, p. 22.); which is thus tranſlated: "There are forty ploughlands; ſix of which, with twenty-four ſervants, and thirteen hog-keepers, are in demeſne. Fifteen villagers, eight cottagers, and fourteen coliberts, occupy the reſt." And the laſt words of the ſentence fortunately hide the contradiction; which is, however, ſelf-evident in the text, as the tranſcriber has copied it; for 6 carucatæ & 36 carucatæ certainly make 42; whereas it is poſitively ſaid there were but forty carucatæ. The paſſage that follows exhibits a ſtill more ſtriking contradiction. There are 100 ploughlands; 16 in demeſne, and 66 in the hands of the villani, in all 82. But tranſlate 16 ploughs in the demeſne, and 66 employed by the villani, and all is conſiſtent. There were a hundred carucatæ; but, on actual menſuration, the land did not amount to ſo much; or the quality of the land was ſuch as to admit of no more than 82 ploughs. In the next paſſage but one we find the ploughlands are forty; nine in the demeſne, and eighteen occupied by the villani; that is, thirteen ſhort of the firſt number.

I ſtop here, as there would be no end of ſuch obſervations; and ſhall only add, that a good judge ſaid long ago, that "when car. or caruc. follows villani or bordarii, it often ſignifies the number of ploughs they kept, and not the land or quantity of it." Brady's Preface.—He might with equal juſtneſs have ſaid, that it muſt always ſignify the number of ploughs, whenever the nature of the paſſage is ſuch as to admit of no other ſignification.

The abbreviation caruc' uſually ſtands for carucatæ, and car' for caruca. Thus, p. 230, col. 1. a. Extra burgum habet ipſa vi caruc' terræ pertin' ad burgum; & ibi habet i car'. But in ſome caſes car' is indiſcriminately uſed for either; which now and then occaſions ambiguity[10].

If any juſtification were neceſſary for differing from Mr. Wyndham in this interpretation, let the following paſſages be produced: "De his habet archiepiſcopu. vi carucatas quas poſſunt arare iii carucæ, fol. 298, a. 2; de vi carucatis ubi poſſunt eſſe iii carucæs ibid.; iii carucate ubi poſſunt eſſe i caruca & dim', ibid.; manerium de vi caruc' terræ q̃ iii carucæ poſſunt arare, ibid.; manerium de x caruc' terræ, ibi poſſunt eſſe v carucæ," ibid. &c. &c. &c.

Ex initio Lib. Rubr. in Scacc.

[9] In two inſtances, in Dorſetſhire, for ploughs we meet with oxen; terra eſt iii boum.

[10] Mr. Warner ſtands not quite clear of miſtake in this reſpect, (Hampſhire, p. 75). "On this yardland are three villagers and five borderers, who occupy two ploughlands." Surely he ſhould have ſaid, who employ two ploughs.

2. A virgate. Four[1] of theſe made a hide[2]. The Chronicle of Battle Abbey[3] reckons eight to one hide, and four virgates to one wiſta. This laſt name is derived from the Saxon ƿiſτa, and in the Regiſtrum Honoris de Richmond, App. p. 44. is made ſynonymous with a virgate. A MS. quoted by Du Cange, makes a virgate conſiſt of 24 acres, and an hide of four virgates. In a regiſter book of Ely, quoted by Mr. Agarde, its contents are from 20 to 60 acres. It differed, as the yard land at preſent, in the ſame manor.

3. A bovate or oxgang. Eight of theſe commonly went to the hide or carucate; ſome contained 12, 16, 18, or 20[4] acres, more or leſs, in different counties.

4. The acre was not equal, for the ſame reaſon that the virgate and bovate were unequal. An acre was 40 perches in length, and four in breadth: or if but 20 perches in length, then eight in breadth[5]; 16, 18, 20, or more feet went to the perch.

5. Arpenna, or arpent, plur. arpenz, a meaſure of land introduced from Normandy, an acre or furlong of ground, is often applied to vineyards. Du Cange quotes a MS gloſſary, which fixes it at 120 by 170 feet; and adds, that two arpennies made a jugerum. Spelman obſerves, that in later ages this name was appropriated to meadows and vineyards. In Leiceſterſhire, not a vineyard being mentioned, the arpenna is of courſe not found.

The meaſures of woodland, meadow, and paſture, are,

1. Leuca, leuga, leva, or leuva. Leuga Anglica conſtat XII quaranteinis, ſays Battle-abbey Chronicle. Ingulphus and Spelman aſſert it was but one mile, and the quarentein a furlong; for the foot was cuſtomarily in ſome places 12 or 18 inches, more or leſs. But the quantity of both theſe meaſures is not to be too peremptorily determined. Sir William Dugdale ſays, "In Domeſday-book, this which the French call league [lieue] ſignifies a mile, or 1000 paces, not a French league, which was twice as much[6]." In the Monaſticon it is 480 perches. Du Cange, however, ſays, the French league was 1500 paces. Ingulphus informs us, that the Engliſh under the Normans followed the French cuſtoms as to the name, but by leuca intended a mile, and in this ſurvey always expreſs the meaſure rather more than leſs than what it really was[7]. The leuca or leuga is by Mr. Blomefield rendered league, by which he does not mean the common league of three miles, but the diſtance of two or thereabouts, which anſwered in the generality of the places he examined as to their extent, which ſeems the beſt way of judging[8]. In our tranſlation, as noticed in a remark on the firſt page, we have generally taken it for a mile; but the wood at Hinckley, which is ſaid to be one leuva in length, is believed to have been three miles long, which is the extent of that pariſh on the South ſide, that is, from the Watling-ſtreet to the Lutterworth road[9].

2. Quarentena (Exeter Domeſday-book, quadragenaria), nemoris, paſcuæ, a fortylong, or furlong, a meaſure of forty perches, the perch being 20 feet[10]. In Domeſday-book it was the uſual meaſure of woodland. The charter of Witlaf, king of Mercia, applies it to arable[11]. Could the quantity of the leuca and quarentena be aſcertained, and a method found to reduce them into hides, it would be uſeful to determine the antient extent of pariſhes.

3. Pertica, or perticata, a perch, a meaſure of 20 feet. The Chronicle of Battle Abbey ſays only 16 feet; and 40 ſuch perches in length and four in breadth made an acre. The pertica regis, in the Cloſe Rolls 11 Hen. III. m. 6. was 24 feet[12].

The only liquid meaſure that we meet with is a Sextarium; which was an antient meaſure, varying with reſpect to the articles that were to be meaſured. From a quotation in Du Cange's Gloſſary, it ſeems, when applied to honey, to have been about four pounds weight[13]. Dr. Brady interprets it to be a gallon. Spelman makes it a quart[14].

The mills, where they occur, are regularly mentioned, and ſometimes half a mill. They were of different values; none in this county being reckoned to be worth more than eight ſhillings a year, and none leſs than one ſhilling.

It no where appears that any perſon had given himſelf the trouble of taking an account of the inhabitants of England, as mentioned in Domeſday-Book, till, in the progreſs of that noble record through the preſs, Dr. Morton, the preſent principal librarian of the Britiſh Muſeum, aſſiſted by Mr. Raſpe, well known by his curious reſearches into mineralogy, after patiently inveſtigating ſeveral of the counties, ſtruck out the idea on which the ſpecimen here annexed is founded. And no one can go attentively through this part of the ſurvey without concluding that, however ſmall the number of inhabitants of this kingdom may have been in other diſtricts, and however indifferently the lands which had ſo few inhabitants may have been cultivated, the county of Leiceſter had, even then, a conſiderable number of inhabitants; which may be diſtinguiſhed into the following claſſes;

The tenants in capite,	44
Sub-tenants of various deſcriptions, de firmâ, in feudo, or otherwiſe, who were almoſt univerſally foreigners,	232
Thanes, or knights,	19
Preſbyters,	41
Burgeſſes,	65
Villans,	2635
Socmen, homagers, and other tenants of a nearly ſimilar deſcription,	1938
Bordars,	1375
Bondmen,	387
Bondwomen,	23
Francigenæ,	61
	6820

Taking the families of theſe ſeveral deſcriptions of people at an average to contain five perſons, it will give the whole number to be about 34,000. Sir Matthew Hale, if we remember right, ſomewhere ſays, that within ſix hundred years from the time of this ſurvey, the number of inhabitants was increaſed in above a twenty-fold proportion. Though he has certainly laid this abundantly too high; yet no man, who has gone through this part of the ſurvey, and has ſeen the populous villages that catch the eye, to the right and to the left, as he paſſes through this county from Harborough to Cavendiſh-Bridge, can avoid concluding, that the inhabitants of Leiceſterſhire have increaſed conſiderably from the time of the ſurvey; though we have here the moſt demonſtrable proof that the increaſe is not greater than the proportion of 2 to 5; that is, from 34,000 to 85,000, which, on the moſt accurate calculation, is believed to be nearly the preſent number.

"The fatal rage of building monaſteries, and crowding them with uſeleſs monks and nuns; this rage, I ſay, which ſeized the kings and nobility of England, after the eſtabliſhment of the Engliſh monarchy, contributed not a little to impede the increaſe of people in that period. The very imperfect ſtate of commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, which occaſioned frequent and deſtructive famines, is at once an evidence and a cauſe of a ſcanty population in theſe times. As a farther evidence of this, it may be obſerved, that there were very few cities or towns in Britain in this period, and theſe few were ſmall and thinly peopled. In Scotland there was not perhaps ſo much as a place that deſerved the name of a city; and in South-Britain, where the Romans had built ſo great a number of towns, we are told by Nennius, there were only twenty-eight remaining in the ſeventh century. There is the cleareſt evidence from Domeſday-book, that not one of theſe cities, even at the end of this period (London and Wincheſter perhaps excepted) contained ten thouſand inhabitants; and the greateſt part of them contained only a few hundreds. York, which is the greateſt city mentioned in that famous record, contained only 1418 houſes, of which there were 540 uninhabited. In Leiceſter there were only 322 houſes; in Exeter 315; and in Warwick 223. Upon the whole, it ſeems very probable, that Britain was not much more populous in the times of the Heptarchy than it had been in the antient Britiſh times before the firſt Roman invaſion; not half ſo populous as in the flouriſhing times of the Roman government[1]; and that, from the eſtabliſhment of the Engliſh monarchy to the Conqueſt, it did not at any time contain above one million and a half of people; ſo fatal was the fall of the Roman Empire to the populouſneſs of its provinces, and ſo ſlowly was the loſs repaired[2]."

It is remarked by Verſtegan, that of the three or four hundred gentlemen who came over with the Conqueror, ſcarcely one quarter of their names or families now remain[3]; and that families are in general compoſed of the Engliſh-Saxons, Danes, and Normans; though the firſt are not only the far greater number, as being and having remained the corps and body of the realm, but alſo may be reputed the antienteſt and mereſt Engliſhmen[4].

Though this ſurvey in general was made with exactneſs, yet the greatneſs of the deſign occaſioned many omiſſions, and prevented it from being ſo exact as ſome hiſtorians repreſent it. The king's view was, to form a judgement of his own lands and demeſnes, and thoſe of his capital tenants. Hence the ſubfeudatarii, or under-tenants, in ſome counties, were not particularly marked; and many cities and towns, now conſiderable for wealth and commerce, are omitted, as not being held by the king or his tenants in capite, but by their feudatarii and under-tenants. Many places are not mentioned which were then waſte ground, or might be included in the ſurvey of other pariſhes, eſpecially if, with the addition of ſuch vills, ſo much land as is ſpecified cannot be found. Another inaccuracy aroſe from the partiality of the commiſſioners in favour of religious houſes. Ingulphus owns, the inqueſt was very favourable to his abbey of Croyland; and, leſt it ſhould be oppreſſed by future exactions, did not return the exact ſurvey of it either with regard to the value or extent of the lands; and no doubt but other monaſteries, biſhops, and nobility, found the ſame favour. But with all its defects, it was a noble and uſeful deſign, both for the prince and ſubject, to prevent the encroachments of the one, and to aſcertain the lands and taxations of the other[5].

The looſe manner of ſpelling Engliſh places in Domeſday cannot be wondered at, when we conſider, that England was then newly acquired by the Normans, who had the chief hand in compiling the returns; and to whom probably the Anglo-Saxon language was as hard to be pronounced as the language of Indoſtan is now to its Engliſh conquerors. In the orthography of names and places the ſcribes were often miſtaken, as they ſeldom copied them from writings, but took them down from the mouth of the Saxon informer, whoſe pronunciation was different, and in general more eaſy and ſoft than the original word[6]. The Normans too might purpoſely deprave and contract Saxon words, out of a deteſtation of that language, in which they would not ſuffer the lawyers to plead, nor children to be inſtructed; ſo that this antient record cannot now with certainty be appealed to for the true and proper names of places. No tolerable etymology can be given of many names of places in this county from the Saxon, and there are ſcarcely any veſtiges of the Britiſh language. Alfred's Domeſday-book might have been preſerved, had the Norman ignorance of, and averſion to, the Saxon language allowed them to make uſe of it. Hence ariſes the impoſſibility of aſcertaining many places mentioned in the ſurvey; not to mention that in ſucceeding ages the ſeveral places of the ſame name were diſtinguiſhed by that of their owners, or by other circumſtances. This inconvenience, however, is as little felt in Leiceſterſhire as in any other county whatever; there being very few places indeed in it which cannot at this moment be clearly identified[7].

The Statute 4 Edward I. intituled Extenta Manerii, has ſo much the appearance of an order for another Domeſday-book, that it becomes a matter of curioſity to enquire whether any thing was done in conſequence of it; and, if ſo, whether there is any record relative to it. Mr. Barrington obſerves on this ſtatute, that it is moſt certainly no act of parliament in any ſenſe of the word, but merely a ſet of inſtructions to the king's Extender, with regard to what he ſhall enquire into, and upon what heads and particulars he is to make his report[8]. The articles of enquiry relate to moſt minute particulars with regard to every man's eſtate: "De pannagio, & herbagio, melle, oleribus, & omnibus aliis exitibus vivariorum, mariſcorum, morarum, bruerarum, turbariorum, & vaſtorum, quantum valeant per annum."

9 Edward II. a mandate was iſſued by the king, to the ſeveral ſheriffs of the kingdom, to return the names of the hundreds in every county, and of the ſeveral burghs and townſhips in each. Returns were in conſequence made from ſeveral counties; but none, that we have ſeen, from Leiceſterſhire[9].

"In the reign of Henry VIII. a general ſurvey was made of the whole kingdom, and of the number of the inhabitants, their ages, profeſſions, wealth, income, and every other particular that a ſtateſman could wiſh to be acquainted with. The ſurvey is unfortunately loſt; and the only information which it contained, at preſent known, is, that the income of the whole kingdom was eſtimated at four millions per annum[10]." One of the warrants for this ſurvey, to a high conſtable in Eſſex, is preſerved by Stow, under the year 1522, ſo ſimilar to that of the Norman Conqueror, that a copy of it in this place may not be unacceptable to the reader; though none of our public records have as yet furniſhed a copy of any return.

[1] Roman Britain muſt of conſequence have become extremely populous when compared with former times. From the abdication of their government in 446 to the Conqueſt commenced a war of 600 years continuance; which induced lord chief juſtice Hale and Mr. Gregory King to agree in aſſerting that the people of England, at the arrival of the Normans, might be ſomewhat more than two millions. In England and Wales, in the year 1588, there were five millions; in 1688, ſix millions and an half; and at this time there are upwards of eight millions. Chalmers' Eſtimate, paſſim.

[6] Kennet, Paroch. Antiq. p. 64. If we had no other proof of the commiſſioners and their ſcribes being all Normans, the names of all places that end in worth would confirm it. The Normans were as incapable of pronouncing the Saxon ð, as they are at this day; and were neceſſitated to make d of it. With reſpect indeed to ſeveral paſſages in the ſurvey, we may juſtly ſay with the judges, who, in 12 Edw. III, were directed by the king's writ to ſearch Domeſday Book, "Neſcimus interpretationem facere niſi quatenus verba inde ſonant."

[7] The greateſt difficulty that occurs in this county is to aſcertain the numerous places called Thorpe. Theſe it ſhall be our endeavours to diſtinguiſh in a future index. See ſome corrections in p. liv.

[8] The learned author of the Obſervations on the Statutes is of opinion, p. 103, that this enquiry was never made, as the complaints occaſioned by it muſt otherwiſe have appeared in ſome of the monkiſh hiſtorians. In the Inquiſitiones poſt mortem, it is, at leaſt in one inſtance, conſidered as an act of parliament; or perhaps, I ſhould ſay, it operated with the full force of ſuch an act. "It is alſo to be enquired of churches of the lord's gift, how many there be, and what, and where, and how much every church is worth by the year, after the true eſtimation of the ſame." And accordingly an inquiſition (poſt mortem Edmundi de Lancaſter, 25 Edw. I.) ſays, "Eccleſia de Duffeld valet £5. per annum."

" During Cromwell's adminiſtration, it was propoſed to take a general ſurvey of the whole kingdom, in imitation of that taken in the reign of Henry VIII. It was begun in London, and in the neighbourhood; and certain committees were appointed, to inquire upon oath, and certify the improved value of every man's eſtate, both real and perſonal. But the attempt was after all given up Indeed, when thoſe who were in power exacted what money they thought proper under any pretence, however frivolous, as delinquency, malignancy, &c. it was unneceſſary to be at the trouble of inveſtigating the wealth and ability of individuals, for the ſake of any regular ſyſtem of taxation[2]."

To the Reader who has not already been much converſant in antiquarian reſearch, theſe obſervations on Domeſday will at leaſt have the merit of novelty. By thoſe who have peruſed the works of my predeceſſors in this line it will be perceived that the ground-work of the preſent eſſay is taken from Mr. Hutchins; and that the later remarks of Dr. Naſh, Mr. Roſe, Mr. Kelham, Mr. Wyndham, Mr. Warner, &c. have not been neglected.

Of ſuch parts as are original, it may be proper to obſerve, that much of the merit is due to my learned Friend the Rev. Richard Gifford, of Duffield, in Derbyſhire, who kindly took upon himſelf the taſk of furniſhing a tranſlation of that part of the ſurvey which deſcribes the county of Leiceſter.

" RES ARDUA VETUSTIS NOVITATEM DARE, NOVIS AUTORITATEM, OBSOLETIS NITOREM, OBSCURIS LUCEM, FASTIDITIS GRATIAM, DUBIIS FIDEM, OMNIBUS VERO NATURAM, ET NATURÆ SUÆ OMNIA. EQUIDEM ITA SENTIO, PECULIAREM IN STUDIIS CAUSAM EORUM ESSE, QUI, DIFFICULTATIBUS VICTIS, UTILITATEM JUVANDI PRÆTULERUNT GRATIÆ PLACENDI." Plinii Præfatio.

Of the ſeveral Land-owners in this county, ſome account ſhall here be given. The contents, however, in the original record, p. 230. a. 2. do not exactly correſpond with the following liſt; Earl Hugo being erroneouſly placed as N° XIII, who afterwards occurs properly at N° XLIII; and " inſtead of N° XVII, Roger de Buſli," it ſhould be (as in the deſcription) " XVII, Robert de Buci; XVIII. Roger de Buſli."

I. King WILLIAM the Firſt, more commonly denominated the Conqueror[3], held 39 houſes in the town of Leiceſter, and received annually 42*l.* 10*s.* for all rents from that city and county, beſides 20*l.* a year from the mint-maſter of Leiceſter. The lordſhips which he held in this county, which of courſe are now ANTIENT DEMESNE, were CROXTON (which then included Knipton and Hareſton); BROUGHTON (in Framland); RODELEY (including the following members, Allexton, Bareſton, Segrave, Sileby, Tugby, Skeffington, the two Markfields, Halſted, Caudwell, Wykeham, Tilton, Aſfordby, Wartnaby, Twiford, Somerby, Friſby, Saxulby, Grimſton, Bagrave, and Gaddeſby); BOWDEN (including Medburn, Cranhoe, Carlton, Galby, Norton, Stretton, Smeton, Foxton, part of Blaſton, and Abegrave; SADINGTON; WETBERGE (with part of Barrow); THORPE ACRE; DISHLEY; SHEPISHED; and KNOSSINGTON (which laſt lordſhip, though within the county of Leiceſter, belonged to the royal ſoke of OKEHAM in Rutland). Only two of theſe manors had been held by Edward the Confeſſor, one by queen Edred, and two by earl Morcar.

King William is ſuppoſed to have poſſeſſed, in the whole of the kingdom included in this ſurvey, 1442 manors[4] or lordſhips, beſides eſcheated lands; and his daily revenue is ſtated by Ordericus Vitalis to have amounted to 1060*l.* 30*ſ.* 1½*d.* over and above free gifts, fines, and amerciaments for offences[1]. He had alſo 60,000 horſemen at his command, to be employed in defence of the realm, without any expence or charge iſſuing out of his Exchequer[2].

[3] " To the glory of William the Firſt, that legitimate monarch had, by advice of the grandees of the realm, iſſued commiſſions through the ſeveral counties of England, ordering ſtrict inquiſitions to be made by the community of each county aſſembled in the county court, to collect and inrol the antient uſages of their reſpective counties; which inrolments were preſented to the king, who, by the aſſent of his grandees aſſembled in his parliament, therefrom made a digeſt of national or common law, ſtyled the laws of Edward the Confeſſor, that is, the Anglo-Saxon cuſtoms and conſtitutions; which digeſt the Conqueror (a term of vulgar invention, in no reſpect applicable to this king, who, like the illuſtrious houſe of Brunſwick, acquired the crown by regular and lawful entail) ratified by his own, and general adjuration, and bound upon his own people under the ſevereſt penalties. This conſtitution the Engliſh were zealous to uphold, and made it the baſis, when they elected their kings, of their elevation." I here anticipate ſentiments which the reader will find enlarged upon in the Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 144.

The Queen, Matilda, does not occur among the land-owners in Leiceſterſhire; but certain townſhips (ſee p. xli.) were de feudo Reginæ. She died Nov. 2, 1083; whence it is evident that the compilation of Domeſday-book was begun before her death, though not finiſhed till 1086. In Dorſetſhire, p. 75. a. 2. and in Glouceſterſhire, p. 163. b. 2. it is ſaid Matilda tenuit, and not tenet, Litelfrome, Turneberie, Fareforde, &c. The ſurvey of thoſe counties, therefore, was not taken till after her death.

II. Thomas, a Norman, archbiſhop of York from 1070 till 1100, was and had been a canon of Baieux. He had lands alſo given to him in Glouceſterſhire, Hampſhire, and in Yorkſhire. His manors in Leiceſterſhire were Tur Langton (to which parts of the other Langtons were then appendant), Lubbenham, Welbam, Keytborp, and Tilton.

III. Remigius, biſhop of Lincoln, was a Norman by birth, of the blood of the Deincourts, who were allied to the Conqueror, and a monk of Feſcamp. He held the ſee of Lincoln from 1070 to 1092; and, beſides his property in Leiceſterſhire[3], had lands in the counties of Bedford, Buckingham, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Lincoln, Northampton, and Nottingham.

William of Malmeſbury's deſcription of the perſon of Remigius is too ſtriking to be paſſed over in ſilence: "Quia ipſe pro exiguitate corporis penè portentum hominis videbatur; luctabatur excellere & foris eminere animus, eratque

Gratior exiguo veniens è corpore virtus.

Quem ideo Natura compegiſſe videtur, ut ſciratur beatiſſimum ingenium in miſerrimo corpore habitare poſſe[4]." To the ſhortneſs of his figure biſhop Fuller alludes in theſe verſes, which he cauſed to be engraven on the tablet over his tomb:

"Hujus Fundator templi Remigius urnâ
Hâc jacet, atque brevi ſit ſatis ampla viro."

I could enlarge on the hiſtory and character of this prelate; but am unwilling to anticipate a memoir, compiled by my venerable friend Dr. Pegge, now actually in the preſs.—From a valuable regiſter of this biſhop, recovered by biſhop Green from the MSS. of archbiſhop Wake[5], and now preſerved amongſt the archives of the dean and chapter of Lincoln, I have been favoured with ſome extracts by John Fardell, eſq. their very intelligent Regiſtrar.

IV. Geoffrey, biſhop of Coutance[6], a noble Norman, was elected to the ſee (which is ſuffragan to the archbiſhop of Rouen) in 1048. He had a diſtinguiſhed command at the battle of Haſtings; and for his ſervices was rewarded with 280 lordſhips, amongſt which was that of Arnſby in this county; and was conſtituted chief juſticiary of Ireland. He preſided alſo at a great trial in the county-court held at Tenterden in Kent, between Lanfranc archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Odo biſhop of Baieux. In 1070 he is called by Ordericus Vitalis magiſter militum; and, in 1074, accompanied biſhop Odo to ſuppreſs a rebellion under the earls of Hereford and Norfolk; and from this prelate the Weſt Saxons, who had aſſaulted Montacute, received a ſevere check. He aſſiſted at a council at St. Paul's 1079; and, after having been preſent at the Conqueror's funeral, joined the biſhop of Baieux in the rebellion againſt Rufus; and died in 1093[7].

V. The abbey of Peterborough, one of the moſt antient of our mitred abbeys, had been founded ſo early as 655 by Peada, king of the Mercians. The chief of this houſe at the time of the ſurvey was Thorold, who is repreſented as a man of boundleſs profuſion. At his entrance into office, in the year 1069, the goods of the abbey were eſtimated at £.1500; which he reduced to one third of that ſum. Being weary of his government at Peterborough, he obtained the biſhoprick of Beauvois in France, whither he tranſported many of the goods of the Engliſh church. But, being expelled thence in the ſhort time of four days, he gave the Conqueror a large ſum of money to be re-eſtabliſhed at Peterborough; where he continued till his death in 1089 or 1100[8]. He had in Leiceſterſhire the manor of Eaſton, with lands in one of the Langtons.

VI. The abbey of Coventry was another of our mitred abbeys, and had been then but lately founded by Leofric earl of Leiceſter. The abbot of this period is believed to have been Leofric II. who died a little before the year 1095. The abbot was lord of Burbach, Barwell, Marſton, and part of Stapleton.

VII. The abbey of Croyland was a very early foundation, by Ethelbald king of Mercia, in 716. The abbot when the ſurvey was taken was Ingulphus, who became the hiſtoriographer of his abbey, after he had ſkreened it from ſevere taxation. He was abbot from 1076 till his death in 1109. His property in Leiceſterſhire was at Beby, Sutton, and Stapleton.

VIII. The King's Eleemosinary Lands in this county were ſituated at Peatling, Sveſbi, Sutton, Elveſtone, Swinford, Wiceſtan, and Sceneſord. What the exact nature of their tenure was we cannot readily define. They were held by five ſub-tenants; three of whom Godvin, Ernebern, and Aluric, were prieſts; the other two were Ingald and the wife of Quintin. A conjecture on this ſubject has been hazarded in p. xl.

IX. The earl of Mellent was Robert de Bellomont, a firm adherent to the Conqueror. In 1107 he obtained the earldom of Leiceſter; and died in 1118. His lordſhips in the county were, Aylſton, Froleſworth, Huncote, and Boſworth. Of this nobleman and his deſcendants a full account is given in the early part of the Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 22—98.

X. Earl Aubrey poſſeſſed ſixteen lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire, ten in Northamptonſhire[9], ſix in Warwickſhire, two in Oxfordſhire, and ten in Wiltſhire, in which laſt county he had property in the time of king Edward the Confeſſor; which ſhews that he was an Engliſhman; but whence he derived his title of earl has not been diſcovered[10]. He is a different perſon from Aubrey de Vere, anceſtor of the earls of Oxford; who married Beatrix, neice and heireſs of Manaſſes earl of Guiſnes, whence he is ſuppoſed to have been earl of Guiſnes, not allowed by Dugdale. He was father of Alberic, the great chamberlain to Henry I, and grandfather to Alberic, who was by the empreſs Maud created earl of Oxford. Four of the nine manors in Northamptonſhire are expreſsly ſaid to be held by Alberic the chamberlain, which was in the reign of Henry II; the other ſix by Alberic ſimply; and a virgate in Clapton by Alberic the monk.

XI. Counteſs Godiva. Of this devout lady, who was ſiſter to Thorold ſheriff of Lincolnſhire, and from the year 1057 had continued the widow of Leofric, ſixth earl of Leiceſter, a full account is given in the Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 17. She poſſeſſed three lordſhips in this county, Norton, Appleby, and Bilſton.

XII. Counteſs Alveva was wife to Algar the ſeventh earl of Leiceſter; and mother of Edwin the eighth earl, and of Morcar earl of Northumberland. She poſſeſſed ſome property at Ayleſton.

XIII. Hugo de Grentemaisnell, a companion of the Conqueror into England, and one of his barons, obtained ſixty-ſeven lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire, twenty in Northamptonſhire, and ſeveral in other counties; and is memorable for having been appointed hereditary lord high ſteward of England. In the cloſe of life he embraced the monaſtic habit at St. Ebrulf in Normandy, where he died in 1094. See a full account of this earl and his deſcendants in the Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 20, 21.

XIV. Henry de Ferieres, or de Ferrariis, ſon to Gualcheline de Ferieres, a Norman, either accompanied the Conqueror, or followed him before the general ſurvey; in which great ſervice, as has been already ſtated, p. xxxiv. he was one of the commiſſioners. He had thirty-five lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire; one hundred and fourteen in Derbyſhire, with many in the counties of Derby, Oxford, Wells, Lincoln, Bucks, and Glouceſter. He was the founder of Tutbury priory; father to Robert the firſt earl of Derby; anceſtor to the lords Ferrers of Chartley, Groby, and Oakham; and conſequently to the preſent earl of Stamford, earl Ferrers, and earl of Leiceſter. A full account of the family of Ferrers will be ſeen under Wymondham, Groby, Bredon, Leiceſter, &c.

XV. Robert de Todeni, another noble Norman, and ſtandard-bearer to the Conqueror, was the founder of Belvoir Caſtle, where his poſterity have ever ſince been honourably ſeated; John-Henry, the preſent duke of Rutland, between whom and the founder there have been but twenty-two generations, being his immediate deſcendant; as is ſhewn under the Hiſtory of Belvoir, p. 66. Robert de Todeni died in 1088; and was buried in the priory which he had himſelf founded; and in the ruins of which in 1793 his coffin was examined, as deſcribed in p. 79. His property in Leiceſterſhire was at Horningbold, Medburn, Blaſton, Harby, Barkſton (and Plungar), Bottesford, Redmile (and Muſton), Knipton, Laughton, Lubbenham, Barkby, Hungarton, Cropſton, Queniborough, Claxton, Howes, and Stathern. The lordſhip of Belvoir, not mentioned in the record, was probably included in that of Wolſthorpe. For a full account of this illuſtrious family, ſee p. 23—68.

XVI. Robert de Veci, another of the Normans who aſſiſted William the Conqueror in his expedition, was rewarded with the lordſhips of Morton, Scentone, part of Cleveliorde, Gumley, Shankton, Thorpe, Baſurde, Cliborne, and Newton, in Leiceſterſhire; and with other great eſtates in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, and Lincoln. From Ivo, called alſo John de Veſci, a great baron, either brother or nearly allied to Robert, the preſent lord Veſci claims his deſcent by the female line.

XVII. Robert de Buci poſſeſſed thirty lordſhips in this county.

XVIII. Roger de Busli had five lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire; Cloſintone, Wimeſwould, Saltby, Wyfordby, and Burton. He had one lordſhip alſo in Devonſhire, eight in Derbyſhire, 49 in Yorkſhire, and 86 in Nottinghamſhire. His principal reſidences were at Tickill Caſtle, Yorkſhire; at Hougham, Lincolnſhire; and at Blithe (near Tickhill) on the confines of Nottinghamſhire, where he had alſo another caſtle. In 2 William Rufus, he founded a priory for Benedictine monks, which he annexed as a cell to the abbey of St. Catharine's on the Mount near Roan, in Normandy. He gave alſo to the monks of St. Peter's in Glouceſter his lordſhip of Clifford; and, ſurviving king Henry I, ſtood firm to his daughter Maud the Empreſs; on which account, king Stephen ſeized upon his caſtle of Tickhill and the whole honour of Blithe, and gave them to Ranulph then earl of Cheſter. The barony terminated in John his grandſon, who left one daughter and heir, married to Robert de Vipont, a great baron of that time.

XIX. Robert Despenser was ſteward to the Conqueror; one of his barons; and had ſeventeen lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire, fifteen in Lincolnſhire, with ſeveral others in the counties of Warwick and Glouceſter. He was brother to the earl of Montgomery, and to Urſo D'Abetot, hereditary ſheriff of Worceſterſhire; father to William le Deſpenſer, who was ſteward to king Henry I; and progenitor to the noble family of Spenſer, now duke of Marlborough.

XX. Robert the Usher (Hoſtiarius) poſſeſſed lands in two lordſhips in this county, Claxton and Howes. He was the ſon of William the Uſher; and his lordſhips devolved to Roger de Buſli.

XXI. Ralph de Mortimer was allied by the mother's ſide to the Conqueror, accompanied him into England, and was one of the chiefeſt commanders in his victorious army. He was afterward ſent to encounter Edric, earl of Shrewſbury, whom he ſubdued, and delivered captive to the king; whereupon he enjoyed Wigmore caſtle, and all the other lands of that earl. He had only two lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire, Sherneſton and Weſtone; but had large poſſeſſions in many other counties.

XXII. Ralph Fitz Hubert held nine ploughlands at Dalby; and had property alſo in Derbyſhire.

XXIII. Wido de Renbudcurt had the lordſhips of Thurſtanton, Stormſworth, Miſterton, Barreſhorde, part of Cleveliorde, and Bareſworde, in Leiceſterſhire; and others in Oxfordſhire, Cambridgeſhire, Northamptonſhire, and Lincolnſhire.

XXIV. Wido, or Guy, de Credun came in with the Conqueror, and obtained the lordſhips of Stoneſby, Waltham, and Sproxton, in this county, and about 60 in Lincolnſhire. He fixed the chief ſeat of his barony at Freſton, in the diviſion of Holland; where Alan his ſon afterward founded a priory of Benedictine monks, which he gave as a cell to Croyland, and ſettled on them the church of Stoneſby. His inheritance paſſed by a female to the family of Vaux; and afterward by another female into that of the lords Ros, anceſtors to the preſent duke of Rutland. See the pedigrees of Creon and Vaux, under Belvoir, p. 28.

XXV. William Peverell was a natural ſon of the Conqueror, by a concubine, afterwards the wife of Ranulph Peverell. William had the cuſtody of the caſtle of Nottingham; with five lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire (Foſton, Erendeſbi, Lubbeſthorpe, Carbi, and Eſſebi), and others in various parts of the kingdom, to the number of 162.

XXVI. William Buenvaleth is mentioned only as holding two ploughlands in Ravenſton; which lay waſte in the time of the Confeſſor, and continued ſo. He had other lands, at the time of the ſurvey, in Warwickſhire.

XXVII. William Loveth, or Levet, had three lordſhips in this county, Diſworth, Thedingworth, and Sewſtern, and others in Berks and Bedfordſhire. He had lands alſo in Northamptonſhire, where we find his poſterity ſeated at Welford, from the reign of Henry III. to that of Edward III, on a manor called Lovet's Manor[1].

XXVIII. Geoffrey Alselin had the lordſhips of Alton, Godeby, Keythorpe, Billeſdon, and Roleſton, in Leiceſterſhire, and a conſiderable barony in the counties of Nottingham, Derby, and Lincoln; but great part of his eſtates, after two generations, went by a daughter to the Bardolphs[2].

XXIX. Geoffrey de Wirce, of a noble family in Bretaigne, came over with the Conqueror; who rewarded him with twenty-ſeven lordſhips, amongſt which was the paramount manor of Melton[3]. He had alſo large poſſeſſions in the counties of Warwick, Northampton, Nottingham, and Lincoln.

XXX. Geoffrey de Cambrai was a land-owner at Sproxton in this county, and had poſſeſſions alſo in Lincolnſhire.

XXXI. Gunfrid de Cioches poſſeſſed three ploughlands in Moſcley; a lordſhip which, at the time of the ſurvey, is deſcribed as lying waſte. He had fixteen lordſhips in Northamptonſhire, and others in the counties of Berks, Bedford, and Nottingham.

XXXII. Humphrey the Chamberlain[1] had two lordſhips in this county, Dalby and Barneſbi; and ſome others in Surrey, Hants, Berks, Wilts, Dorſetſhire, Glouceſterſhire, and Suffolk.

XXXIII. Gilbert de Gaunt, ſon of Baldwin earl of Flanders, and nephew to the Conqueror, married Alice, daughter and heir of Robert, ſon of Hugh Montfort. In Leiceſterſhire he had only five ploughlands at Bareſworth; but poſſeſſed ſeveral lordſhips in different counties. He fixed his ſeat at Folkingham, co. Lincoln, which he made the head of his barony. Gilbert V. was ſummoned to parliament 26 Edward I; but, having no iſſue, conſtituted the king heir to all the lands of his barony, and the others went to his heirs female.

XXXIV. Girbert had two lordſhips in this county, Aſhby and Moſeley.

XXXV. Durandus Malet is ſuppoſed to have been nearly allied to the great baron Robert Malet. He had property at Burton, Preſtwould, and Wimeſwould, in this county; and divers lordſhips in Nottinghamſhire and Yorkſhire.

XXXVI. Drogo de Bevrere was a noble Fleming, who attended the Conqueror on the invaſion, and was rewarded with the lordſhips of Orton and Hoby in Leiceſterſhire; and ſeveral others in the counties of Northampton, York, Lincoln, Norfolk, and Suffolk. He probably was anceſtor of William de Briwere, who ſtood in great favour with the kings Henry II, Richard I, John, and Henry III, and had large property in Somerſetſhire, where he founded ſeveral religious houſes[2]. William his ſon died without iſſue 16 Henry III. leaving his five ſiſters his heirs.

XXXVII. Maino the Briton had in Leiceſterſhire the lordſhip of Lutterworth, with lands at Miſterton and Thorpe; and other lordſhips in the counties of Hertford and Northampton.

XXXVIII. Oger the Briton had the lordſhip of Sileby in Leiceſterſhire; and others in the counties of Lincoln and Northamptonſhire. Theſe are two exceptions to the general ſuppoſition that the baronies were all given by the Conqueror to his followers; and that ſuch Engliſhmen as were favoured with their own lands again were contented to hold them as tenants to Norman lords, and under ſuch compoſitions, rents, and ſervices, as they put upon them[3]. Maino and Oger were certainly themſelves barons, and tenants of the king in capite; as all thoſe were who are enumerated at the head of every county, and not mentioned as earls or ſpiritual perſons, thani, miniſtri, or ſervientes regis[4].

XXXIX. Nigell de Albini (a younger brother to William de Albini Pincerna, anceſtor to the earls of Arundel) was of noble extraction, and by the mother's ſide a Mowbray. He came into England with the Conqueror, who rewarded him with the lordſhips of Seile and Dunton in Leiceſterſhire, and ſeveral large poſſeſſions in the counties of Bucks, Bedford, and Warwick. He was afterward bow-bearer to William Rufus; who, for his aſſiſtance in ſome martial expeditions, gave him the caſtles of Bayeux and Mowbray, with all the lands forfeited by Robert de Mowbray earl of Northumberland. He obtained alſo all the vaſt poſſeſſions already enumerated of Geffrey de Wirce; and thus poſſeſſed 120 knights' fees in Normandy, and 140 in England. He founded a priory at Axholme; aſſumed in his latter days the habit of a monk; died at an advanced age at Rouen; and was buried in the abbey of Bec. See a fuller account of him, and of his family, under Burton Lazars, p. 272.

XL. Judith the Countess had 42 lordſhips in Leiceſterſhire, and others in the counties of Middleſex, Oxford, Bedford, Northampton, and Rutland. She was daughter of Lambert de Lens, by Maud counteſs of Albemarle (ſiſter to the Conqueror's wife); and by him was given in marriage to Waltheof, ſon of Richard, the great earl of Northumberland, Huntingdon, and Northampton, beheaded at Wincheſter[5] for rebellion againſt the king who had raiſed him to ſuch elevated rank; or, as ſome ſay, by procurement of his wife; and left iſſue three daughters: Maud, married to Simon St. Liz, earl of Huntingdon and Northampton; Alice, by ſome called Judith, wife of Ralph de Toeni; and . . . ., married to Robert, fifth ſon of Richard de Tonebrugge[6]. After the death of earl Waltheof, king William offered Judith, his widow, in marriage unto Simon de S. Liz, a noble Norman; but ſhe refuſing him, in regard he was lame on one of his legs, the king, in much wrath, diſpoſed of the earldom of Huntingdon to that Simon. Whereupon, being extremely terrified, ſhe fled away with her three daughters, and lurked in ſeveral places; and became ſo ſenſible of her guilt in promoting her huſband's death, that in great penitence ſhe continued all the days of her life a widow[7]. This Judith founded the priory of Helenſtow in Berkſhire; and procured from king William a charter of divers immunities and privileges for the monks of Saltry in Huntingdonſhire, of the Ciſtercian order; which religious houſe ſhe much frequented in her time.

XLI. Adeliza, wife to Hugo de Grentesmainell, was lady of Brokeſburne, Herts, and the inheritrix of a noble family. She had three manors in Leiceſterſhire (Mardegrave, Peatling, and Barkby); three in Warwickſhire, and four in Bedfordſhire; died about 1091; and was buried in the monaſtery founded by her huſband at St. Evrauld[8].

XLII. The King's Servants (Servientes Regis) were the king's ordinary miniſters, or ſervants, whom he employed in his country affairs and buſineſs, in managing and looking after his manors and lands, his foreſts, his fiſhings, &c. his deer, his beeves, his dairies, cows, horſes, ſheep, hogs, corn in the granaries, &c. Some others were employed in hunting, hawking, &c. Some were bowyers, carpenters, and other mechanicks and artificers; and many were ſmall officers in the court, thoſe eſpecially that had lands given them, which they nor their fathers held in the time of Edward the Confeſſor; others in cities and great towns; nor could any but Saxons be well employed in theſe ſervices, as the Normans knew not the country, nor underſtood the lands, and were incapable of many of the ſervices[9]. The perſons under this deſcription in Leiceſterſhire held ſmall portions of lands at Barrow, Newton, Holeton, Wymeſwold, Eaſtwell, Ricoltorp, Eſſeberie, and Sharnford.

XLIII. Earl Hugo de Abrincis, ſurnamed Lupus, earl of Cheſter, the Conqueror's ſiſter's ſon by Richard Goz, had 24 lordſhips in this county. He was a perſon of great note among the Norman nobility, and a very expert ſoldier, for which reaſon he was placed ſo near the unconquered Welſh, to reſtrain their excurſions; and his earldom was given him to hold as free by the ſword, as the king held England by the crown. He adhered firmly to Rufus in the revolt of biſhop Odo; was in high favour with Henry I; died about 1101, leaving Richard his ſon and heir; and was buried in the chapter-houſe at Cheſter.

[5] He was brought to the place of execution in his conſular robes; whereupon his body was firſt there interred upon the meeting of two highways, but afterwards tranſlated to Croyland, and buried in the chapter-houſe of that monaſtery, by Wulkitel, the then abbot; whereunto he had formerly given the lordſhip of Bernak, in Northamptonſhire, wherein there is a famous quarry of ſtone, of great uſe to that religious houſe. It is reported by one of the monks of that place, that, not long after his ſepulture there, the counteſs Judith, his widow, becoming very penitent for her former miſcarriage towards him, brought a pall of ſilk, and laid it on his tomb; which, being too ſhort, by a divine power, ſtretched itſelf forth to a fit length; and that, when abbot Ingulphus tranſlated his corpſe out of the chapter-houſe into the choir, he found it perfect in all parts, and not corrupted with any putrefaction; moreover, that being laid near the high altar, many infirm people, who came out of devotion thither, were miraculouſly cured by his merits. Abbot Henry cauſed a tomb of marble, with his effigies thereon, to be erected near the ſteps aſcending towards the high altar, on the left hand; and thither removed his relicks with great ſolemnity and devotion in 1219. Dugdale, Bar. vol. I. p. 55; where ſee his epitaph, and a farther account of his miracles.

XLIV. The Homagers (or Homines) of the earl of Mellent held twelve lordſhips in this county. Of theſe homagers ſomething has been ſaid, p. xlii. But the term Homines ſeems to have been applied in various ſenſes in different parts of the record; and in ſome places to mean literally either what we ſhould now call "the good men of the county," or a jury of tenants aſſembled at the lord's court; with which latter interpretation the "Homines Goisfridi de Wirce," p. 235. b. 2. exactly correſponds.

The names of ſome few of the places mentioned in the ſurvey of Leiceſterſhire having appeared doubtful, they have been attentively re-examined with the original MS; the reſult of which is, that in the copy publiſhed by authority, there appear to be but three errors, only one of which is of any conſequence.

The following apparent ſlips of the original ſcribe agree with the book:

ESSAY ON THE MINT AT LEICESTER.

THFRE is no reaſon to think that any place in LEICESTERSHIRE was of ſufficient importance to enjoy the privilege of a mint [1], either in the Anglo-Saxon or Norman times, except the town of LEICESTER. Nor is there any written record remaining of the eſtabliſhment of a mint in that place before the Conqueror's ſurvey, which is deſcribed in Domeſday-book, unleſs we ſuppoſe this place to be included in that general expreſſion in king Athelſtan's regulation, A. 929. in aliis caſtellis [burgis, as Leland has it, Coll. vol. III. 2d edit. p. 213.] unus.

In that curious and well-known regiſter, Domeſday, we are informed, that at Leiceſter, called in that ſurvey Ledeceſtre, the moneyers paid twenty pounds every year, which were to conſiſt of pennies, twenty of which weighed one ora, or ounce. If theſe pennies weighed, one with another, twenty-two grains, the number of grains in the ounce would be 440; if they weighed 22½, it would be 450: and even then would fall ſhort of the legal ſtandard, which was that of 480 grains to the ounce. But as many pennies of Edward the Confeſſor (who coined a great deal of money, which muſt have been the chief currency at this time, and ſtill remains in large quantities) are ſeven or eight grains under this weight, if the payment was made in theſe, there muſt have been a conſiderable incrementum in an additional number of pennies, which was called making payments ad ſcalam. Two thirds of this ſum were paid to the king, as the lord paramount of the right of coinage; the other third, or the third penny, as it is called in the record, belonged to Hugh de Grentemaiſnil, the vicecomes, which was the common proportion.

The number of moneyers is ſometimes ſpecified in this record, though not noticed in this county. It is not therefore certain how many were eſtabliſhed in Leiceſter in the reign of William I. But their profits muſt have been conſiderable, or their privileges great, to have compenſated for the payment of ſo large a ſum. The mint, it may here in general be obſerved, was a privileged place in towns where coining was allowed; and the monetarii ſeem to have been tenants of the king in capite, and to have had the privileges of ſaca & ſoca [2].

As we receive ſo little information from Domeſday-book relative to the mint at Leiceſter [3], the defect is to be made up from the coins themſelves. Before the time of Athelſtan, only two or three places of mintage appear upon the Saxon coins, expreſſed upon ſome of the types of Egbert, Ethelwulph, and Alfred. Theſe are chiefly preſented in the form of monograms. And though the types of Edward the Elder are numerous, no coin of that king has yet occurred with the place of mintage. But during the reign of his ſon Athelſtan, and particularly after the time of his taking upon himſelf the title of BRIT. TO. REX, many places of mintage appear upon his coins: and it is certain that ſeveral moneyers were fixed at Leiceſter during his reign. Indeed, it is very probable there was a mint at this place long before; yet no coins can be aſcertained as belonging to Leiceſter till that period. Very few towns are impreſſed upon the coins of his two immediate ſucceſſors, Edmund and Edred, and, I may add, thoſe of the unfortunate Edwy. But in the laſt coinage of Edgar [4] they begin to be numerous. However, I have not had the good fortune hitherto to ſee one coin certainly ſtruck at Leiceſter during his reign, and only one has occurred to me belonging to his ſon Edward the Martyr, which carries with it the leaſt probability of having been ſtruck at Leiceſter. The legend on the head ſide is EEADǷEA. REX ANꝽLO; on the reverſe, ǷANꝽRIM MO. LIE. But as I am inclined to think the inſcription is blundered for LINE, and that the coin was ſtruck at Lincoln, I have not engraved it. But after Ethelred the Second coins of the Leiceſter mint are very common; and I have engraved one or more of each reign, to the time of Henry the Second incluſive. Here the ſeries of Leiceſter coins muſt be cloſed; at leaſt, none have fallen under the notice of the Antiquary after this period; and it is probable that the mintage ceaſed with the demolition of the caſtle in 1175 or 1176.

In the early period of the Saxon mintage, it is difficult to diſtinguiſh the coins of Leiceſter from thoſe of Cheſter, as the names of both places were then nearly ſimilar. In this uncertainty, I have given thoſe of LIEꝽE, LEꝽER, LEHER, &c. to Leiceſter, as Cheſter is generally Legeceſter, without the I or the R. However, I am not certain that I have always been right, as ſome of the inſcriptions with LEꝽ or LEꝽE may have belonged to Leiceſter. After the time of Canute, there is no difficulty.

[1] "The jus cudendi being a royal right, properly belonging to ſovereigns only, has ever been thought to do honour to the places where it was exerciſed, as well as to be of profit to them. It was therefore eſteemed and deſired by the Colonies, and indulged to them by the Roman emperors." Maurice Johnſon, on the Roman Mint at Lincoln, Bibl. Brit. N° XX. p. 56; who has given us alſo, the ſeal from an inſtrument of William Fitz Otho, dated 1302, on which are his inſignia as monetarius or maſter of the mint, the coining hammer in his right, and ſword in his left. He is ſeated on a throne or large circular ſeat of judicature, as Cuneator; whoſe buſineſs it was to ſee that the coins, though minted in different towns, bore the ſame impreſs, for which reaſon all the dies were made in London under his inſpection; and it appears from Madox's Hiſtory of the Exchequer, that the Cuneator preſented the makers and cutters of the dies for the approval of the barons." Ibid. p. 63.

[2] Theſe privileges are already explained in the Diſſertation on Domeſday.

[3] That the mint was ſituated near the North-bridge, appears from an enumeration of the poſſeſſions of the Abbey of St. Mary de Pratis: "Dedit nobis Fundator noſter, apud pontem de North, carucatam terre, que jacebat olim ad Cuneos monete." See Dugd. Mon. vol. II. p. 308.

[4] There is a coin of Edgar in the cabinet of Mr. Southgate, which reads on the obverſe EADꝽAR; on the reverſe, MELÐVSAN LE. There are three other in the Britiſh Muſeum with the ſame obverſe; the reverſes of which are ÆLFSTAN LE. FROÐRE MO. LE; and ÐVRMOD LE. All of which moneyers ſtruck money at the ſame place, which might be Cheſter as well as Leiceſter. The type of theſe pennies is the ſame, with the ſmall croſs on one ſide, and on the other a croſs and two annulets.

INTENDED KNIGHTS OF THE ROYAL OAK.

(From a MS. of PETER LE NEVE, Eſq. Norroy King of Arms.)

King Charles the Second, after his Reſtoration, had a deſign of creating a new order of knighthood, in honorary reward of ſeveral of his followers. The knights were to have worn a ſilver medal (pendant to a ribband about their necks), on which was to have been expreſſed the figure of the king in the oak, and their title was to have been that of KNIGHTS OF THE ROYAL OAK; but this deſign was laid aſide, leſt it ſhould occaſion new heats and animoſities, and open afreſh thoſe wounds which it was moſt prudent ſhould be healed. The following is a liſt of ſuch gentlemen of the county of Leiceſter as were deemed fit and qualified to have been of this order, with the value of their reſpective eſtates in 1660:

[1] 30 Hen. II. the king conſtituted Henry de Wyngham (afterwards chancellor of England and biſhop of London) with one knight in every county from Trent Southwards, to have cuſtody of his eſcheats in the ſaid ſeveral ſhires; as alſo to enquire of all ſerjeanties, ſo as to certify in whoſe tenure they then were, to diſcover by whom, and to whom any alienations were made: by virtue of which commiſſion, they had power to call before them 24 or 12 of the moſt ancient lawful and diſcreet knights in each partioular county, who, being ſworn, were to enquire upon ſuch articles as ſhould be exhibited to them touching the ſaid eſcheats and ſerjeanties, the certificates whereof are recorded in the Exchequer in that known volume called Teſta de Neville, under the title, De Serjeantiis arentatis. Dugd. Warw. I. 353.

[2] The counties of Warwick and Leiceſter being at that period under the government of one and the ſame ſheriff, the return of the two counties are in many parts blended in the original. We have taken LEICESTERSHIRE ſingly, wherever it was practicable to ſeparate the two counties.

[1] Hugh Wallys, or de Welles, archdeacon of Wells 1204; lord chancellor the ſame year; conſecrated biſhop of Lincoln December 21, 1209. He died February 8, 1234, and was buried under a grave-ſtone in his cathedral. Having rendered himſelf infamous by adhering to the ſeditious Barons and the Dauphin of France againſt the King; and being thereupon excommunicated by the Pope, he was forced to buy the cenſure off with a thouſand marks. In conjunction with Joceline Biſhop of Wells, he founded an hoſpital at Wells; and is ſaid to have founded a chantry in his cathedral to pray for his ſoul; and to have left 5000 marks in pious uſes, beſides various legacies to his friends and relations. Godwin de Præſ. ed. Richardſon, p. 288, 289. Willis, Cathedrals, II. 50.

[2] Hugh, biſhop of Lincoln 1186—1200. "As this biſhop was a perſon of ſingular reputation, and exemplary integrity, ſome of my readers may not be diſpleaſed if I give them a ſhort account of the life of ſo good a man, eſpecially as the mere peruſal of affairs tranſacted many centuries paſt may be tedious to ſome of them, unleſs variegated with ſome amuſing digreſſions of another kind. This Hugh was the firſt prior of the Carthuſian monks at Witteham, in the county of Somerſet. Grenoble, a city of Burgundy [Dauphiné], was his birth-place. At the requeſt of his father, he took on him the profeſſion of religion, and ſoon after became a moſt rigorous Carthuſian, even exceeding the auſtere rules of that order farther than was incumbent on him to do. At the inſtance of King Henry the Second, who had heard of his great virtues and piety, he left his own country, very unwillingly, notwithſtanding he was to enjoy the preferment of being made prior of Whitteham, a foundation that king had lately made. This monarch often called him to his moſt private conferences; and ſuch was his regard for him, that he procured him to be elected biſhop of Lincoln (which ſee had been vacant about two years), before Hugh himſelf knew any thing of the king's deſign; and, by giving the ſee ſo good a prelate at laſt, made ample amends for having ſo long ſuffered a vacancy in the epiſcopal chair. He was elected Auguſt 10, 1186, and conſecrated September 21 following. He was a moſt ſtrict diſciplinarian in his dioceſe, yet was he more beloved than feared. His cathedral church of Lincoln he entirely rebuilt from the foundation, a very memorable and coſtly work. He muſt have been rich in treaſure as well as good works; for, beſides the expence above mentioned, he gave the king 100 marks to acquit himſelf and ſucceſſors from the payment of a mantle of ſable, with which the biſhops of this ſee had been accuſtomed to preſent the king every new year's day. In the year 1200 his reſolution carried him to viſit the Chartreuſe, the firſt and principal houſe of his order; and he died at London, of a quartan ague, on his return, Nov. 17, 1200. His body was ſoon conveyed to Lincoln, at which city the two kings of England and Scotland happened to be then on an interview with each other, attended by a great concourſe of nobility of each kingdom. So great was the veneration each of them bore to this prelate, that they gave an inſtance of their great regard for him, which in theſe days would not be thought altogether in character; they both actually aſſiſted in carrying his body on their ſhoulders from the gates of the city to the church door. What reſemblance of this have we in more modern monarchs? The royal diadem ſhould indeed ſupport the mitre, or both muſt fall; but later practice has been of a different nature. In the year 1220, this Hugh was cononized at Rome in the papacy of Honorius III; and in 1282 his remains were taken up and placed in a ſilver ſhrine, at which innumerable miracles are ſaid to have been performed. See Matt. Paris, ſub ann. 1200. This Biſhop ſeeing the hearſe of fair Roſamond adorned with ſilk, and illuminated with tapers, in the choir of the nunnery at Godſtow, near Oxford, was ſo offended at the poſthumous ſtate of that royal concubine, that he ordered her body to be directly moved into the church-yard, ſaying, the other place was too good for a harlot; and all women ſhould be terrified by this example from following her ſteps. The anniverſary of St. Hugh had uſed to be obſerved with great ſolemnity, and particularly at Leiceſter." This note is Sir Thomas Cave's; from Godwyn's Catalogue of Biſhops, 1615, p. 295.

[1] Simon was at that time the Rural Dean, or "Archdeacon," as he is here called, an officer then of no ſmall importance. In Bp. Atterbury's "Miſcellanies" is a "Charge" delivered to the archdeaconry of Totneſs, which contains much curious information relative to this office.

[2] Sic. In Burton it is printed "capellam de Shenton."

[3] William de Bleys. He was biſhop in the ſmall interval between the two Hughs, being elected in 1201, though not conſecrated till Aug. 24, 1204. [1] Made by the Parliamentary Viſitors in or about the year 1650.

[2] "That it might appear that what was done within the houſes was agreeable to thoſe who were without; and that the ſame ſpirit reigned in parliament and people; all poſſible licence was exerciſed in preaching, and printing any old ſcandalous pamphlets, and adding new to them againſt the Church: petitions preſented by many pariſhioners againſt their paſtors, with articles of their miſdemeanors and behaviours; moſt whereof conſiſted in 'their bowing at the name of JESUS, and obliging the communicants to come up to the altar,' (as they enviouſly called it), that is, to the rails which incloſed the communion-table, 'to receive the ſacrament.' All which petitions were read with great delight, and preſently referred to the committee about Religion; where Mr. WHITE, a grave lawyer, but notoriouſly diſaffected to the Church, ſat in the chair; and then both petition and articles were ſuffered to be printed and publiſhed (a licence never practiſed before), that the people might be inflamed againſt the Clergy; who were quickly taught to call all thoſe againſt whom ſuch petitions and articles were exhibited (which were frequently done by a few of the rabble, and meaneſt of the people, againſt the ſenſe and judgement of the pariſh), the SCANDALOUS CLERGY; which appellation was frequently applied to men of great gravity and learning, and the moſt unblemiſhed lives." Rex vicecomiti Leiceſtrie. Precipimus tibi, quòd ſine dilatione facias habere dileĉto & fideli noſtro Sahero de Quincy terram extra murum Leiceſtrie, que fuit com' Leiceſtr', quam ei commiſimus in cuſtodiâ, ſi non ſit de Grantemeſnill, nec de dote comitiſſe Leiceſtrie; ſalvâ comitiſſe Leiceſtrie terrâ quam ei reddi precipimus in eſcambium terre de honore de Grantemeſnill, quam idem comes dedit decano Lincoln' per concordiam inter eos faĉtam pro terrâ illâ; & ſalvâ canonicis Leiceſtrie terrâ quam idem comes dedit eis in ligeâ poteſtate ſuâ, quam eis reddi precipimus. Teſte meipſo, apud Turrim London', xxviij^{to} die Aprilis [1].

Rex vicecomiti Leiceſtrie, &c. Mandamus tibi, quòd ſine dilatione facias habere dileĉto & fideli noſtro Sahero de Quency Baggeworth, Weſton, & Soneby, que fuerunt com' Leiceſtr', unde mandatum noſtrum recipiſti, quòd ea liberares comitiſſe Leiceſtrie in cuſtodiâ, percipienda quamdiù nobis placuerit, ſi non ſint de honore Grantemeſnill, nec de dote comitiſſe, quam ei prediĉto Sahero commiſimus in cuſtodiâ, donec illud ei inde fecerimus. Teſte meipſo, apud Turrim London', xxviij^{to} die Aprilis [2].

Saherus de Quincy reddit compotum de tribus optimis caſzuris pro habendâ medietate ſuburbii Leiceſtrie, quod partitum fuit per juratam legalium hominum ultimò faĉtum per preceptum regis [3].

Rex vicecomiti Leiceſtrie ſalutem. Precipimus tibi, quòd ſine dilatione plenam ſeiſinam habere facias Roberto de Veteri Ponte de omnibus terris que fuerunt Yvonis de Veteri Ponte, fratris ſui, in ballivâ tuâ, qui eſt cum inimicis noſtris, quas ei conceſſimus quamdiu ei placuerit. Et quia, &c. Teſte comite, apud Winton', 5 die Aprilis [4].

Rex vicecomiti Leic' ſalutem. Precipimus tibi, quòd mercatum quod teneri precipimus apud manerium Fulconis, filii Warini de Noſburg, per diem Jovis, clamari facias, & teneri ibidem de cetero per diem Martis, niſi, &c. Teſt' H. &c. apud Weſtm', vj die Februarii, per eundem [5]."

Rex vicecomiti Leic' ſalutem. Scias, quòd conceſſimus, per cartam noſtram, dileĉto & fideli noſtro Hugoni Diſpenſer. quòd ipſe & heredes ſui habeant imperpetuum unum mercatum ſingulis ſeptimanis, per diem Jovis, apud manerium ſuum de Luĉteburgh; & quòd habeant ibidem unam feriam ſingulis annis per tres dies duraturas; ſcilicet, in vigiliâ & in die & in craſtino beati Petri ad Vincula; ita tamen, &c. Et ideò tibi precipimus, quòd prediĉtam cartam in pleno comitatu tuo legi, & prediĉtum & prediĉtam feriam per totam balliviam tuam clamari & firmitèr obſervari, &c. T. R. apud Weſtm', 28° die Aprilis [6]."

R. vicecomiti Warr' & Leic' ſalutem. Meminimus nos aliàs tibi precepiſſe, quòd non permitteres monetam aliquam tonſam in balliviâ tuâ currere; quod tamen, ut audivimus, permiſiſti hucuſque, hujuſmodi precepto noſtro non obſtante, unde non immeritò mirari poſſumus & moveri. Et ideò tibi precipimus iteratò, quòd, ſicut teipſum & omnia tua diligis, per totam balliviam tuam clamari & firmitèr inhiberi facias ex parte noſtrâ, nec aliqua hujuſmodi moneta currat in balliviâ tuâ à tempore quô hoc clamari feceris & prohiberi; immò, ſi aliqua moneta tonſa currens inveniatur impoſterùm, ipſam de precepto noſtro facias penetrari. Omnes etiam, quos cambitores hujuſmodi monete inveneris, arreſtari facias per corpora ſua; ita quòd eos habeas ad mandatum noſtrum. Teſt' R. apud Merton', 26 die Nov'. [7]

In 1324, it appeared that William de Ferrars, deceaſed, held the perquiſites of a third part of the court of the honour of Winton, with the view of frankpledge; and that Henry de Ferrars, his ſon and heir, was then aged 22 [8].

In 1393, it appeared, that Joan Clare, the wife of ſir Henry de Ferrers of Groby, knight, deceaſed, held for term of life, in dower, a third part of the court of the honour of Winton; which third part was held of the king by knight-ſervice [9].

In 1422, it appeared that Maud (who was the wife of John Lovel, knight), deceaſed, was ſeiſed of a ninth part of a certain court, called Wincheſter Court, yearly held at Leiceſter from three weeks in three weeks [10].

In 1427, it appeared that Elizabeth (wife of Henry de Beaumont), deceaſed, was ſeiſed of a certain court at Leiceſter, called Wincheſter Court [11].

In 1454, it appeared that William Lovel, &c. deceaſed, was ſeiſed of a ninth part of the perquiſites of a certain court, called Wincheſter Court, to be held yearly at Leiceſter, from three weeks to three weeks; alſo of two meſſuages, with two gardens annexed to the ſame, in Leiceſter; and of two acres of meadow in the ſame town; that they were held of the king, as of the honour of Leiceſter, by fealty only; and that John Lovel, knight, was his ſon and heir [12].

In 1463, it appeared that William Beamont, viſcount Beamont, attainted of high treaſon, was ſeiſed of a moiety of the honour of Wincheſter fee [13].

Oĉt. 26, 1464, king Edward IV. granted the whole purparty of the honour of Wincheſter fee, co. Leiceſter (late parcel of the poſſeſſions of William lord Beaumont) to William Haſtings, his chamberlain [14].

In 1583, it appeared that William lord Haſtings, deceaſed, was ſeiſed of a purparty of the honour of Winton, called Wincheſter fee, held of the king [15].

Sept. 22, 1597, it appeared that Henry Haſtings earl of Huntingdon, deceaſed, was ſeiſed of a ninth part of the honour of Winton [16].

Sept. 30, 1607, it appeared that George Haſtings earl of Huntingdon, deceaſed, was ſeiſed of a ninth part of the honour of Winton [17].

Letters to Thomas Lord Cromwell, &c. relative to various Religious Houſes.

1. "It may pleaſe your Maſterſhip to underſtand that, in going Northward from London, I took in my way towards Lichfield, whereas I appointed to meet with Dr. Leigh, firſt a priory of Gilberdynes and Nuns [1], incloſed and cloſe; whereas they would not in any wiſe have admitted me as viſitor. I would not be ſo anſwered, but viſited them; and there found two of the ſaid nuns not barren; one of them impregnavit ſupprior domûs, another a ſerving-man. The two prioreſſes would not confeſs this, neither the parties, nor none of the nuns but one old beldame. And, when I objected againſt the ſaid prioreſſes, that, if they could not ſhew me a cauſe reaſonable of that their concealment, I muſt needs and would puniſh them for their manifeſt perjury; their anſwer was, that they were bound by their religion never to confeſs the ſecret faults done amongſt them, but only to their own Viſitor of their religion; and to that they were ſworn every one of them at their firſt admiſſion.

"Another priory called Harwold [2], wherein was four or five nuns with the prioreſs. One of them had two fair children; another one, and no mo. My lord Mordaunt, dwelling nigh the ſaid houſe, intyſſed the young nuns to break up the cofer whereas the cōvent ſeal was. Sir John Mordaunt, his eldeſt ſon, then preſent there, perſuading them to the ſame, cauſed there the prioreſs and her fooliſh young flock to ſeal a writing made in Latin; what therein is contained neither the prioreſs nor hir ſiſters can tell, ſaying that my lord Mordaunt telling them that it is but a leaſe of a benefice improperite with other ſmall tenandries. They ſay all, they durſt not ſay him nay; and the prioreſs ſaith plainly that ſhe never would conſent thereto. This was done ſince Michaelmas. To call my lord Mordaunt to make anſwer thus by power and might in his country to uſe houſes of religion of the king's foundation (meſeemeth) ye can no leſs do by your office, unleſs ye will ſuffer the king's foundations in continuance by every man to be abuſed [3].

"At St. Androſe in Northampton, the houſe is in debt greatly; the lands ſold and mortgaged; the farms let out, and the rent received beforehand for 10, 15, 20 years; chantreys founded to be paid out of the lands, and great bonds of forfeitures thereupon for non-payment. The houſe is £400. in revenues. The king's foundation thus to be mangellede by the quondam, I have petie! The prior now is a bachelor of divinitie, a gret huſband, and a good clerke; and petie it is that ever he came there. If he were promoted to a better thing, and the king's grace would take it into his hands, ſo might he recover all the lands again; which the prior ſhall never. In my return out of the North, I will attempt him ſo to do, if it be your pleaſure.

"The college of Newarke here in Leiceſter, of the king's foundation, with an hoſpital, is well keeped, and honeſt men therein; £300. in their treaſury-houſe beforehand. The Abbey here is confederate, we ſuppoſe; and nothing will confeſs. The abbot is an honeſt man, and doth very well; but he hath here the moſt obſtinate and factious canons that ever I knew. This morning I will object againſt diverſe of them b and adultery, & ſic ſpecialitèr diſcendere; which I have learned of other, but not of any of them. What I ſhall find I cannot tell [4]. This morning we depart towards Lichfield church; and from thence to certain abbeys upon Trent-ſide; and ſo to paſs over to Southwell, and to be at York within a day after the 12th day we intend; and thus to make ſpeed with diligence and true knowledge of every thing is our intent.

"My lord of Lincoln commanded the preachers here of Newark college that they ſhould no more preach but only in their own benefices. Why ſhould he inhibere any man to preach the word of God? He viſited here at Leiceſter, and through his dioceſe in theſe parts, at Lent laſt, only to prevent the king's viſitation. He cannot viſit but de triennio in triennium; and he prevented his time more than half a year, ſo to prevent the king; & ſic viſitavit pendente viſitatione metropoliticâ, to the derogation of my lord of Cant's power and prerogative metropolitican given him by the king's highneſs. If he will ſo ſuffer his power to be contemned, it is petie he ſhould have his mitre. From Lichfield, craſtino divi Thomæ. By the ſpeedy hand of your aſſured preſt and frende Rychard Layton [5]."

2. "Mie ſingular good Mayſter, mye dewtye remembred, I truſt in God that you be in good helth; for the which I more than all other doo my moſt bounden to praye for. Pleaſithe it your good Maiſterſhip to underſtand that, accordyng to mye dewe promyſſe, I have ſent by mye ſervant, the barer herof, the hundred pounds whiche I promyſed to you for your greate and manyfold payns takyn in my favour; and that I ſend it with as good will as ever I ſent anye thing in mye lyef [6]; humblye beſeching your infynyt goodnes to contynue continuallye your former favour; the which, God beyng mye record, I prefer above all my lyvyng. Wheras your Mayſterſhip did requyre me for the ferme of Yngwordſby in maiſter Rychard's favour, I have as vehementlye moved mye brotherne therfor, as I woold have doon for a ryght hygh matyer; but byecauſe it ever was the demeane lands of the houſe, and that withought the ſame ferme we can bryng upe nether bevs ne muttons for the mayntynans of our hoſpytalytes, I cannot bend them to yt; for, mye predeceſſour dyd bring our pour monaſterye to the hindrans that it is yn bye lettyng that ferme. Therfor, ſyns your pleaſur is that I ſhall proſpour, bycauſe I am of your Maiſterſhip's advauncement eſpecially, I with knelyng hart beſech your goodnes not to requyre it; partlye, bycauſe my brothernly in noo wyeſs will graunt or agree to yt; eſpecially, bycauſe the lacke of that ferme is the extream undoyng of our houſſe. Thus, your good Maiſterſhip extendyng your old goodnes to me your bedyman, I and all mye brotherne ſhall be bonden to praye for your proſperouſe helthe; for, we have no other demeane lands but that. Chriſt Jeſus have your Honour in his bleſſed tuition! Amen. The xix daye of Aprile. By your aſſured bedeſman, in and at all tymes, John Abbot of Leyceſter [7]."

3. "Right Honourable; After all humble recommendations, theis ſhal be to advertyſe you, that we have byn yn execution of the kyng's commyſſion directed unto us, begynnyng at Chacombe, wher we accomplyſhed all thyngs accordyng unto our commyſſion; and from thens we repayred to Aſsheby, wher after on days terryng we were fayn to depart thens unto Cateſby nunray by occacion of ſykeneſſe, where we have alſo accompliſhed the kyng's commyſſion accordyng to his high commandement and our poore diſcretion; wiche howſe of Cateſby we founde in verry perfett order, the priores a ſure wyſe diſcrete and very relygious woman, with ix nunnys under her obedyence, as relygious and devout and with as good obedyencye as we have in time paſte ſeen, or belyke ſhall ſee. 4. "Right honourable ſir, after my humble recommendations; this ſhall be to advertiſe you, that I have received your moſt comfortable letters; for the which, in my right lowly wyſe, I render unto you moſt hearty thanks. Pleaſeth it your maſterſhip to be farther advertiſed, that we have ſurveyed the houſe and priory of Broke [2] (the certificate whereof I ſent you by your farmer's ſon and my nephew Roger Carell this preſent the 18th day of June); the priory of Bradley; the abbey of Olveſton; the priory of Kirby-Belers; the priory of Woulſtorp; and now be at the abbey of Garadon. And, ſir, foraſmuch as of late my fellows and I did write unto Mr. Chancellor of the Augmentations in favour of the abbey of St. James, and the nunnery of Cateſby in Northamptonſhire [3]; which letter he ſhewed unto the king's highneſs in the favour of thoſe houſes; whereat the king's highneſs was diſpleaſed, as he ſaid to my ſervant Thomas Harper, ſaying, that it was like that we had received rewards, which cauſed us to write as we did; which might put me in fear to write, notwithſtanding the ſure knowledge, I have had always in your indifference, giveth me boldneſs to write to you in the favour of the houſe of Woulſtorp; the governor whereof is a very good huſband for the houſe, and well-beloved of all the inhabitants thereunto adjoining; a right honeſt man, having eight religious perſons [4], being prieſts, of right good converſation, and living religiouſly, having ſincere qualities of virtue, as we have not found the like in no place; for, there is no one religious perſon there, but that he can and doth uſe either embrothering or writing books with very fair hand, making their own garnements, carving, painting, or graffyng; the houſe without any ſlander or evil fame, and ſtanding in a waſte-ground very ſolitary, keeping ſuch hoſpitality, that, except by ſingular good proviſion, it could not be maintained with half ſo much land more as they may ſpend; ſuch a number of the poor inhabitants nigh thereunto daily relieved, that we have not ſeen the like, having no more land than they have. God be even my judge, as I do write unto you the truth, and none otherwiſe to my knowledge, which very pity alone cauſeth me to write! The premiſſes whereof conſidered, in moſt humble wiſe I beſeech you to be a mean unto the king's majeſty for the ſtanding of the ſaid Woulſtorp [5], whereby his grace ſhall do a myche gracious and a meritorious act for the relief of his poor ſubjects there; and ye ſhall be ſure not only to have the continual prayers of thoſe religious perſons there, but alſo the hearty prayer of all the inhabitants within four or five miles about that houſe. And this, for lack of wytt, I am bold to write unto you in the pleynes of my heart, as unto him that of all living creatures I have moſt aſſured and faithful truſt in. So knoweth our Lord God; who have you in his moſt merciful tuition! From Garadon, the xixth day of June. Your bounden bedeman at commandment,

George Gyffard [6]."

5. "My moſt bounden dutye remembryd; this is to advertis youre good lordſhippe of the hole eſtate of the late monaſtery of Leyceſter, in the wiche we have taken the ſurrender and ſeyne of thabbot and convent, and the writinges therof be in my cuſtodye. By your lordſhippes goodnes towardes me, I now ame in the poſſeſſion of the houſe, and all the demeynes wiche was unlett at the tyme of our repare thether. We alſo founde the houſe indettyd to dyvers creditors in 411*l.* 10*s.* over and beſides certain ſums of money the houſe was indebted to the kinges heyghnes, wherof we make no reconinge; and for the diſcharge therof we have made ſale of the ſtoke and ſtore, withe the houſhold ſtuffe and ornaments of the churche, wiche amounte unto £228. The plate is onſolde, wiche Maiſter Freman takith the charge of, and is valuyd at, by weyght, 190 pounds. The lead, by eſtimac̄on, is valuyd at £1000.; the bells at £88. For the diſchargeynge of thabbott, convent, and ſervants of the ſeide monaſtery, there haithe beyne payde, as dothe apere more particularly by the bouke we ſend yowr lordſhippe, £149. And for as moche as thabbot hathe not receyvyd of us but £20. he hath requyride me to deſyer your lordſhippe to be ſo good lorde unto hym, he may have 20 pounds, or 20 marks more. The church and houſe remeynythe as yet undefacede, and in the cherche be many thynges to be made ſale of; for the wiche yt may pleſe yowr lordſhippe to let me knawe yowre pleyſure, as well for the further ſale to be made, as for the defaſinge of the chirche [7] and other ſuperfluous byldinges wiche be abowt the monaſtery. A hundrithe marks yerly will not ſuſteyne the charges in reparyng this houſe, yf all byldinges be lett ſtande, as your lordſhippe ſhall knowe more hereafter. Thus I pray Jheſus longe to preſerve you in helthe with much honore. Written at the late monaſtery of Leyceſter, the xxixth day of Auguſte, by your lordſhipes moſt bownden ſervante, Frauncis Cave [8]."

6. "My dutye unto your ryght honorable lordeſhyp in moſt humble forme remembred; pleyſeth hyt the ſame to be by thes advertyſed that I have cauſed xx*l.* to be delyvered unto my fellow Thomas Avery to the uſe of your good lordeſhyp, humbly beſeeching your lordſhipp's favor and goodnes, that, as ſhall ſtand with the king's pleſure, I may ether purchaſe or have in ferm the demenes of Gracedewe abbey, whych I am in poſſeſſion of and my fellowe Whalley together by your honorable letters; which ſeyd abbey the erle of Huntyngdon doth labor to take from me, which have no truſte but of your lordſhipp's goodnes, wythout whych I am undoyn; for I do feyre the ſeyd erle and his ſonns do ſeke my lyfe, and all for the truthe ſake; for, I have ſecret warnyng by on of hys counſell to wayre a privy coate; whych is not ſuffycient for me, his power beyng envyron my poore howſe. Beſeechyng God that your lordeſhyp wyll take in good parte my inornate Collectyon of the kyngs ſupremycy, wherin ys no thyng apte to be preſented unto your lordſhyp but the appearance of a trewe herte, wyth whych I ſhall contenewally pray and labor to ſend your lordſhyp your moſte noble hert's deſyre. From Whelleſborough, the xxviiith daye of Decembre. Your humble ſervant, John Beamount."

IV. p. 209.—"Neither the piety and diſcretion of the prioreſs, the charity and regularity of the nuns, or the ſolicitations of his highneſs's commiſſioners, were able to divert the king from his purpoſe, or prevent the ruin of the monaſtery." Bridges, I. 33.—The nunnery of Stikeſwold in Lincolnſhire, conſiſting of "18 nuns, one ſiſter, beſides officers and ſervants, to the amount of 50 perſons," had a little more indulgence. On paying a fine of 900 marks; £150 for firſt fruits; and an annual penſion to the king of £34; they were favoured with a new foundation; which in two years after was again diſſolved. See in the above-cited MS. p. 255. b. a curious letter from this convent, praying to be relieved from payment of the penſion; and promiſing to "take pains, live poorly, ſerve God, and pray daily for the king's majeſty."

This part of the Roman Route from London to Lincoln, was laid down by J. Throsby from observations, upon an Excursion over it, in Octr. 1791.

I. Mr. Leman on the Roman Roads and Stations in Leicestershire.

The roads, which paſs through this county, are the Watling-Street, the Foſs, and (a way leading croſs the iſland from Colcheſter to Cheſter, which I ſhall call) the Via Devana.

The known and fixed ſtations are, Ratæ, Leiceſter; Vernometum, on the borders of the county, in the pariſh of Willoughby; Benonæ, High Croſs; and Mandueſſedum, Manceter.

I. Of the Watling-Street.

The Watling-Street, in its courſe from Richborough to Wroxeter, after paſſing through Kent, Middleſex, Hertfordſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, and Northamptonſhire, enters the county of Leiceſter at Dowbridge (near which, but on the Northamptonſhire ſide, and in the pariſh of Lilburn[1], is the ſtation of Tripontium): this road is ſo ſtraight, ſo perfect, and ſo well known, that it would be ill employing one's time to deſcribe it more minutely. From the Avon, which it paſſes at Dovebridge, to the Anker near Manceter, the Watling-Street ſerves as the South-weſt boundary of the county from Warwickſhire: and at the diſtances marked in the Itinerary are found the two next ſtations on it, of Benonæ[2], High Croſs; and Mandueſſedum[3], Manceter.

Theſe ſtations, as well as Ratæ and Verometum, are mentioned in the firſt, fourteenth, and eighteenth, Itineraries of Richard; and in the ſecond, ſixth, and eighth, of Antonine. A trifling variation in the ſpelling of a name, and a miſplacing of the figures which mark the diſtances, owing to the careleſſneſs and inaccuracy of the tranſcribers, is all the difference that can be found between theſe ſeparate Itineraries; but the preciſe ſpot of each ſtation is even at preſent ſufficiently pointed out by the foundations, urns, coins, and other remains of antiquity, had we not the additional confirmation of their reſpective diſtances correſponding ſo exactly with the miles of the Itineraries.

II. Of the Foſs.

The Foſs Road is ſuppoſed to have proceeded from ſome ſtation on the ſea-coaſt of Lincolnſhire, probably between Grimſby and Saltby, croſs England in a South-weſterly direction to Moridunum, the great port of the Weſt: and indeed, in the ſummers of 1788 and 1789, with my learned friend, Dr. Bennet (the preſent biſhop of Cork), I traced it with little difficulty from Ludford[4], an undoubted ſtation at the head of the Bain, clearly to Lincoln, and thence into Devonſhire. From Lincoln[5], at the diſtances marked in the ſixth Itinerary of Antonine, are found ſtations ſo exactly anſwering to thoſe diſtances, that it appears unneceſſary to look for them any where elſe. At twelve miles from Lincoln is Brugh[6] (Crocolana); ſeven miles thence, at the great paſſage of the Trent, where the Weſtern branch of the Ermine-Street (which quitted the Eaſtern in its way to Ancaſter, between the preſent 95th and 96th mile-ſtones, in the great North road between Stamford and Newark) paſſed the river, not far diſtant from the preſent turnpike-gate at Thorpe, was Ad Pontem[7]; ſeven miles farther was Margidunum[8], near Eaſt Bridgford; and at the diſtance of thirteen miles, after paſſing a tumulus near Willoughby on the borders of Nottinghamſhire, the road deſcends the hill to the ſtation Vernometum[1], which ſtood on the banks of a ſmall rivulet in a field well known by the name of Herrings or Blackfield.

The Foſs now entering Leiceſterſhire, I ſhall take the liberty of being more particular in my deſcription of it.

After quitting the ſtation of Vernometum, the Foſs makes a ſmall bend (as it frequently does at entering or leaving a ſtation), but, ſoon regaining its former bearing, continues ſtraight to Sex or Segs-Hill, and, though now much defaced, is ſtill eaſily traced by its continuing almoſt always in the ſame direction, and from its being ſtill in many places high-ridged, and in ſome paved with large round ſtones.

At Sex-Hill[2] is a conſiderable tumulus, and alſo the remains of an entrenchment, where the Foſs is interſected by another road, apparently Roman, coming from Paunton on the Ermin-Street, in an E. N. Eaſterly direction, pointing towards Barrow upon Soar, and which, if continued in the ſame bearing croſs Leiceſterſhire, would have paſſed the Via Devana North of Markfield, and fallen into the Watling-Street, near Etocetum, or Wall, in Staffordſhire, at its junction with the Ryknield-Street.

From Sex-Hill, the Foſs, in going over the commons and Thruſſington Woulds, keeps generally near the hedge, till it deſcends into the valley beyond Ratcliff. It leaves the great oblong tumulus of Shipley-Hill[3] to the left, and, croſſing the Wreak and another ſmall rivulet near Syſton, paſſes by a vaſt tumulus at the place where the Melton Mowbray quits the Leiceſter road, and, going through Thurmaſton[4], proceeds directly to Ratæ[5] or Leiceſter.

In Leiceſter it joins the Via Devana (of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter); and both, continuing through the town together, leave it by the great Gate-way ſtill remaining (but which has, I know not for what trifling reaſon, been called the Temple of Janus); and, paſſing the meadow oppoſite to King Richard's Bridge, where its original breadth is ſtill viſible, it ſuddenly turns to the left (on croſſing the ſecond branch of the Soar), over the meadows; and, gaining its old bearing, joins the Narborough turnpike, and continues with it as far as the fourth mile-ſtone from Leiceſter. The Foſs here quits the turnpike, and, going over the fields, leaves the town and church of Narborough to the left; and is ſtill quite plain as it deſcends the laſt incloſure oppoſite the Green-Lane by which the Foſs is continued to High Croſs.

Near Croft the farmers were breaking up in many places the ridge of the Roman road by carrying out their manure, when I paſſed it in 1788; and it was impoſſible not to obſerve ſtill parts of the ſtone, with which it had been paved, lying about on every ſide. Near Soar-mill, where the road has been entirely neglected, and is covered with water, one could feel plainly the broken pavement as one road over it. In a direct line, and without any variation, the Foſs continues from hence, over fields, to Benonæ[6], where it joins the Watling-Street[7].

III. Of the Via Devana.

The Via Devana runs from Colcheſter (Camalodunum) in Eſſex to Cheſter (Deva Colonia).

This road was firſt taken notice of by the late Dr. Maſon, who, obſerving ſome parts of it quite perfect for many miles in Cambridgeſhire, hinted that, from its bearing, he ſuppoſed it was continued to Cheſter. He himſelf found it in Huntingdonſhire, Northamptonſhire, and, I believe, afterwards ſaw ſome traces of it in all the different counties from one ſide of the iſland quite to the other.

The preſent biſhop of Cork and myſelf travelled the greater part of it in the years 1788 and 1789; and I ſhall now inform you more fully of that part of it which paſſes through your county, while at the ſame time I lay down a ſhort ſketch of its general route, as it is not mentioned in any of the Itineraries.

From Colcheſter (the undoubted Camalodunum), Dr. Maſon ſays, it came "by Earls Colne to Hedingham; from thence by the river to Yeldham; then, croſſing the highlands by Whitley, proceeded by the Stour to Havirhill, (probably a ſtation on it); then, paſſing Withersfield, and going through Horſeheath park to the right of lord Montford's late houſe, runs ſtraight and high raiſed for ſeveral miles to Gogmagog-hills; on deſcending which to Redcroſs (where it threw off a branch by Grancheſter to Sandy), it bears a little to the left, to avoid the fenn; but, turning on the high ground, paſſes through Cambridge, and by the preſent turnpike to Godmancheſter (the commonly-ſuppoſed Durolepons), where it joins the Ermin-Street: it croſſes the Ouſe; and, going on the Weſt ſide of Huntingdon by the gallows, is ſtill viſible for two or three miles to Alconbury; from whence it croſſes the remainder of the county to Lilford-Bridge; and is ſeen plain and high raiſed on Rockingham Foreſt (as it croſſes the road from Rockingham caſtle to Kettering), bearing to a tumulus on the brow of the hill near Cottingham.

From this tumulus is plainly ſeen a windmill (in preciſely the ſame bearing beyond Medbourn); it now deſcends the hill, and, croſſing the Welland, enters Leiceſterſhire.

For three or four miles over the low grounds it is (as is generally the caſe in marſhy ſoils) obſcure; it then paſſes by Medbourn[8], an undoubted ſtation on it[9]; and beyond the village is diſtinguiſhed by quickſet planted on it, to prevent people going out of the track of the common road. It then goes under the hill on which ſtands Slauſton-mill, and is plainly ſeen on another hill, which ſeparates the pariſhes of Cranoe and Glooſton, where, as well as at Medbourn, is a tumulus. At a little diſtance from hence it enters the incloſure, and is the common bridle-way to Leiceſter. It now in many places is high raiſed, and ſo exceedingly remarkable, from its being compoſed of an artificial ſoil, as to make it impoſſible to miſtake it. In paſſing by Gartre buſh, a vicinal road appears to have croſſed it, as if coming from near Harborough, in the direction to the camp at Burrow-hill [1]. From hence it continues ſtraight, and without the leaſt variation, by Norton Hedges (near which place, on looking forwards, Markfield-windmill on the foreſt is ſeen diſtinctly over the loweſt and middle ſpire of Leiceſter), between the two Strettons, cloſe to Stoughton Grange; and from thence, though now entirely deſtroyed, over the fields to the South gate of Leiceſter.

[6] Benonæ, Ratæ, and all other towns in the plural number, were ſo called, as conſiſting originally of more towns than one: thus Benonæ included the preſent buildings at Clayhurſt and Claycheſter: Ratæ, the buildings or towns on each ſide of the river; and, among the antients, Athens was called Athenæ, as comprehending four diſtinct villages; and Syracuſe, Syracuſæ, as made up of five. WM. CORK AND ROSS.

[7] Bergier, in his very elaborate and learned treatiſe on the Roman Roads, has obſerved that the Itineraries take notice of "ſuch parts alone of the roads as were paved." This may poſſibly account for no other part of the Foſs except what is included between the ſtations of Lincoln and High-croſs being mentioned in either of the Itineraries of Antonine or Richard. And as it is more than probable that the officer employed in making this part of the Foſs erected the mile-ſtones on it, the mile-ſtone found near Leiceſter fixes the time of its completion to the reign of Hadrian.

[8] If one were to indulge a conjecture, Medbourn might originally be called Medium, a name not uncommon in the Itineraries. It is nearly the centre or half-way ſtation between Colcheſter and Cheſter, the two great Roman colonies which were united by this road; and the Saxons often preſerved the firſt ſyllable of the Roman name with a termination of their own, as Londinum, London; Corſtopitum, Corbridge, &c. WM CORK AND ROSS.

[9] Gough's Camden, vol. II. Additions, p. 197; pavement; vide Ant. Soc. Min. and Stukeley, as quoted Itin. Cur. vol. I. p. 104; and coins; alſo tumuli.

It joins the Foſs, as I remarked before; and both of them continued together through the great gateway, or Janus's Temple, and croſſing the two branches of the Soar (the laſt near Richard's Bridge), whilſt the Foſs bears off to the left. This turns up by a bottom, to avoid a hill; and, recovering its old direction, leaves to the right the great lane, called Anſties or Aſhby's Lane; and, going ſtraight forwards 80 or 90 yards wide, pointing to a windmill, paſſes directly to Groby, where lord Stamford's houſe ſtands upon it. From Groby it paſſes "over the hill," ſays Dr. Maſon, "leaving Markfield-windmill to the South-weſt about two furlongs; then by Aſhby-de-la-Zouch to Burton." I thought, on riding over this country, that it appeared to go through Markfield, leaving the church a little to the right, and then up Stoney-Lane; whether Long-Lane was ever a part of it, I am uncertain; but it appears to be in its direction, as it points to the Ryknield-Street North of Burton.

Through the greater part of Staffordſhire it is traced with little difficulty, but more particularly from Draycot ſtraight to Lane Delph, and then by Wulſtanton church to the ſtation at Cheſterton, and thence to Nantwich and Cheſter.

As it may be a proper object of curioſity to ſome one to trace more particularly the Via Devana [2] from Groby towards Burton, I ſhall take the liberty of giving the following hints; firſt, that, invariably on all the Roman roads which I have ſeen throughout England (and I have traveled moſt of them), tumuli or barrows are found on every eminence (unleſs they have been ſince deſtroyed), and generally the two ſucceſſive ones in ſight of each other (as the direction probably by which the engineer originally laid out the road), as well as at all thoſe places where any vicinal road branched off from the great ſtreet, or paved way, to ſome dependant camp or inferior ſtation; ſecondly, that all Roman roads run invariably in a ſtraight line, except where they meet with ſome local impediment, ſuch as a ſteep mountain or a deep ravine, or where they bend out of their general direction to approach or leave a ſtation, or to throw off ſome vicinal road.

And that great caution muſt be uſed, leſt the perſon ſhould be miſled by roads having the ſame name with the one he is exploring, as generally all roads or lanes leading to ſuch general road are called by the name of the great road or ſtreet itſelf. Thus, at Leiceſter, the lane which leads to the Foſs is called The Foſs: thus, at Cirenceſter, the great road which comes from Wincheſter by Wanborough, in the part near Cirenceſter (through which the Foſs itſelf paſſes), is called The Foſs Road, though in a contrary direction from the general bearing of the Foſs. And the ſame road near Wincheſter is called The Ikenield-Street, though in a quite contrary bearing to that great Britiſh way, becauſe it led to it. Many other inſtances may be given, becauſe ſuch miſtakes exiſt about every ſtation; but I ſhall only mention one more, which is that at Bath (another great ſtation on our Foſs Road); almoſt all the ſmaller ways or lanes leading to it are called by the general name of the great road to which they led, "The Foſs Road."

Beſides what I have mentioned, I have heard there is a camp, probably Roman, at Ratby [3], N. W. of Leiceſter, and trenches at Saltby [4]: and a teſſellated pavement, coins of Conſtantine, and urns, &c. have been found at Rodeley [5] near Mountſorrel.

V. p. 93; the camp contains 16 acres; the rampart, vaſt ſtones covered with turf, and a ditch; Stukeley, as quoted, p. 102, 103.

[2] It would be worth while to examine the two roads which we ſuſpect to be Roman; viz. the one that croſſes the Foſs at Segshill; and the one that croſſes the Via Devana near Gartre Buſh. Probably other ſtations will be found; for, it appears, by Mr. Leman's obſervations and my own, that this iſland had many more towns and roads in it than has been generally imagined. I have found undoubted marks of five roads round the town of Cambridge only. WM. CORK AND ROSS. [See p. cliv.]

II. Additional Obſervations; by the Biſhop of CORK AND ROSS [6].

"The firſt ſtation from Lincoln was Crococolana, probably Brough. We ſaw an urn, a ſpear, and other Roman Antiquities found there. Collingham, where ſome antiquaries would ſend us, is too far out of the road, and, in this Iter at leaſt, it is probable that no ſtation was out of the road at all; for, the number of miles from Leiceſter to Lincoln by the Foſs, at preſent, agrees exactly to the ſpecified diſtance in both Antonine and Richard between Ratæ and Lindum formerly: which makes it impoſſible for the Romans to have gone to any ſtation much either to the right or left of the preſent road. Suppoſing, then, Crococolana to be Brugh, the next ſtation is Ad Pontem [7], 7 miles, and, paſſing through Newark to Thorpe Bar, is a ſituation very like one: the Trent comes cloſe to the road which makes a bend (one of the marks of a ſtation) to that point: the diſtance anſwers exactly; and directly oppoſite to the other ſide of the river, 4 miles off, is Southwell, where Roman antiquities have been found, and which was called by the Saxons Tiovulfingaceſter, a termination given almoſt excluſively to Roman cities. At Southwell, then, might be the Roman town; a bridge near the Trent connected it with the Foſs, and, Newark not then exiſting, it was a great paſs into Nottinghamſhire. At the Southern end of the bridge, on the high bank of the river, was perhaps a ſmall ſtation or fort to protect it, which would be called the Statio ad Pontem, as the Statio ad Anſam, ad Trivonam, and others in the Itineraries. And perhaps this idea will reconcile the jarring numbers of Antonine and Richard, one of them ſtopping at the bridge, and therefore calling it ſeven miles from Crococolana; the other croſſing to the city, and thence putting it down at twelve. When the caſtle at Newark was built in king Stephen's time, both Crococolana and Ad Pontem would be robbed of their materials, both lying ſo near and convenient for water-carriage; which will account for there being no remains diſtinguiſhable at either of them [8].

"Our next ſtation is Margidunum, 12 miles. Eaſt Bridgford, where abundant remains have been found, anſwers exactly: another proof that Ad Pontem is where we placed it. A little beyond Bridgeford the turnpike to Nottingham turns off to the right;

[6] See Throſby's "Hiſtory of Leiceſter, 1791," p. 14.

[7] Ad Pontem means no more than the way-poſt To the Bridge, meaning that leading to Southwell, which was certainly a Roman town. See p. cl. note 1. G. A.

[8] Raſtall, from much ingenious reaſoning, the diſcovery of Roman coins, and from antient and reſpectable authority, fixes the Roman Ad Pontem, afterwards the Tiovulſingaceſter of the Saxons, at Southwell.

but the Foſs, though now unfrequented, continues its name and courſe over the Wolds, per vaſta plana, as old Higden calls them, to Willoughby.

"Near Willoughby, in the neighbourhood of Over and Nether Broughton[1], Stukeley fixes a ſtation. Coins have been found there. The diſtance anſwers to Vernometum; but Stukeley miſtakes the name, and ſuppoſes it Margidunum, an error which has cauſed others in his work, and which is the more unaccountable, as, in conſequence of it, he has no place for Vernometum at all, and ſuppoſes it to be ſomewhere or another (he does not pretend to gueſs where) out of the road[2].

"The moſt remarkable place beyond Willoughby is Segs, or Sex, Hill, where is a barrow, and ſeems to have been a ſmall ſtation not noticed by the Itineraries, and where a large Roman road croſſes the Foſs in a direction from Wall in Staffordſhire (Etocetum) towards Grantham, or the towns on the Ermen-Street. The Foſs ſtill continues without a poſſibility of miſtaking it, being extremely broad, and ſometimes raiſed, till it meets the Melton road about 4 miles from Leiceſter. Here the turnpike, as uſual, and the neighbouring great town, has deſtroyed it. But, in making the preſent road, a pedeſtal was diſcovered, and near it a ſtone bearing an inſcription that it was two miles à Ratis: the ſtone is ſtill in the pig-market[3] at Leiceſter, and the pedeſtal left covered in the high road, which therefore goes certainly in the track of the old Foſs.—At Leiceſter, the Temple of Janus, as it is called, appears to me the Janua of the old city. The more I examine it, the more my idea is confirmed. The Foſs went out at it; and in the meadow between the Temple of Janus and the old bridge, over which king Richard was carried, (a circumſtance which ſhews it was the old entrance into the town[4]), the traces of it are very apparent. A Roman bridge, I have no doubt, ſtood on the very ſpot of this Saxon one, which is now walled up and neglected[5]. The Foſs, after paſſing the bridge, bore a little way full Weſt, perhaps to clear the walls of the town; a moſaic pavement on the left ſhewing us it extended farther than it does at preſent; and then, turning directly South, regains both its old name and direction, and bears right for Vennones or Cleyceſter."

WM. CORK AND ROSS.

III. Extract from Mr. ROGER GALE's "Eſſay on the Four Great Roman Ways."

After tracing the Foſs from Totneſs into Warwickſhire, Mr. Gale obſerves, "that the courſe of it through that county is very plain and conſpicuous. From Stretton ſuper Roſs it runs to Hawford, where it paſſes the Stour; and then leaving Combrook, Compton, Murdack, Lighthorn and Cheſterton a little on the Eaſt, it croſſes the Leam to the Weſtward of Marton. Then going through Stretton upon Dunſmore, Brettford upon Avon, and Brinklow, and after that leaving Stretton ſubtus Foſſe, Stret-Aſton, and Monks Kirby on the Eaſt, in which pariſh part of it lies open like a ditch, having not been filled with ſtones and gravel as in moſt other places, it cuts the Watling-Street, and enters Leiceſterſhire at the High Croſs[6]. From High Croſs it takes its courſe in a line almoſt parallel to the Soar, running about half a mile South-eaſt from Sharnford, which I ſuppoſe owes its name to it. Thence it goes towards Narborough, where it appears a little Weſt of the town: then to Langham Bridges, and ſo to the Weſtgate of Leiceſter. From Leiceſter, Higden tells us, the Foſs went through the Waſts toward Newark. What theſe Waſts were is hard to define; perhaps part of them might be the Foreſt of Charnwood. That it ran not far from the edge of it, is evident, by its leaving Leiceſter without entering it, and croſſing the Soar, about two miles lower, at a place called Calveswater, to Thurmaſton; whence it paſſes the river Eye at Lewen Bridge, and then goes on to Seggs-hill, near Segrave, and ſo to Willoughby on the Wolds in Nottinghamſhire, where it may be ſeen a little Eaſt from Widmerpole by the Lodge on the Wolds, and again in Eaſt-Bridgeford fields: ſo that the Vaſta plana, which Higden ſays this road paſſed towards Newark, ſeem to be no other than what are now called the Wolds in this country."

Of the Watling-Street road, Mr. Gale ſays, that "it is the boundary of the counties of Warwick and Leiceſter; and the places it makes its neareſt approaches to in this part of its courſe, are Catthorpe, Shawell, Benſford-bridge, and Bitteſby, which it croſſes, as it does the Foſs-way at High Croſs, near Cleyceſter."

[1] See more particularly under that pariſh.

[2] As the diſtance between Leiceſter and Lincoln ſeems, by modern maps, to be 51 miles, and in the Itinerary of Antonine 53, (which is a very wonderful agreement); it is plain, that all the places mentioned muſt lie on the ſtrait line of the Foſs; and, if ſo, you cannot go from it, either to right or left, for Vernometum or Margidunum. But, of all the ſtudies, this is perhaps the leaſt ſatisfactory. There are difficulties within ten miles of London, a well-known country, that cannot ſatisfactorily be got over. G. A.

[3] In the mayoralty of alderman Biſhop, 1783, an effectual attempt was made to eſtabliſh a pig-market in the Belgrave-gate, the ſpot where the milliary is now placed.

[4] How doth a foot-bridge three feet wide ſhew this? Perhaps it was only a private bridge of the friers. G. A.

[5] It has ſince fallen down; but, luckily, not before a good view of it was taken by Mr. Schnebbelie.

[6] "Juſt upon the edge of Leiceſterſhire and Warwickſhire, at High Croſs, I met the Watling-Street, my future conductor. Benonis ſtands in the interſection of the two great Roman roads that traverſe the kingdom obliquely, and ſeems to be the centre of England, and higheſt ground; and from hence rivers run every way. The Foſs went acroſs the back-ſide of the inn, and ſo towards Bath. The ground hereabouts, the ſite of the antient city, is very rich; and many antiquities, ſtones, Roman bricks, &c. have been dug up: Roman coins were found when they ploughed the field Weſt of the croſs. Mr. Lee, of Leiceſter, informs me of a Roman urn, in his poſſeſſion, found at High Croſs: digging for a vault, in the church, for the late lord Denbigh, they found a dozen of them covered with Roman bricks. Foundations of houſes have been frequently dug up along the ſtreet here, all the way to Cleyceſter. The bearing of the Foſs here is exactly North-eaſt and South-weſt, as upon the moor on this ſide Lincoln. In the garden before the inn was a tumulus, lately taken away: under it they found the body of a man upon the plain ſurface, as likewiſe under ſeveral others hereabouts upon the Watling-Street. Cloudbury-hill, two thorn-buſhes upon a tumulus on the Foſs, is ſuppoſed the ſepulchre of one Claudius. The city probably was of a ſquare form, humouring the croſſing of the roads, and had conſequently four ſtreets and four quarters. Many foundations are dug up along all the roads. It commands a charming proſpect to Ratæ, Vernometum, Coventry, &c. and quite round. You go through a gate by the croſs to regain the Foſs: at the length of a paſture it meets the true old road. Being now got upon the Watling-Street, I made this remark of it, that it is the direct road to Rome; for, take a ruler, and lay it in a map of Europe from Cheſter through London and Dover, and it makes a ſtrait line with Rome: ſo the great founders had this ſatisfaction when they travelled upon it, that they were ever going upon the line that led to the Imperial Capitol." Dr. Stukeley, Itin. vol. I. p. 110.

IV. Mr. Ashmole to Sir William Dugdale, on the Watling-Street Road[1], 1657.

After parting from you at Rothwell, I met with nothing obſervable in my journey, ſave a very large rampire at Goldſborough in Northamptonſhire, which is ſituate upon a high hill, and preſents a large proſpect every way. The difference and imperfect directions of the countrymen cauſed me to waſte ſix hours before I got to Antonine's Bennavena, and our Weedon. There I entered Watling-ſtreet (which the people yet call The Street-way); and within a mile the old Roman-way diſcovers itſelf very plainly, the ridge continued perfectly viſible for another mile; and then at Norton it is taken-in by incloſures, where now the common road, turning a little on the right hand, does about half a mile farther re-enter Watling-ſtreet. Thence it is plain to New-Inn; and four miles farther I met with the veſtigia of an antient fort, about a bow-ſhot on the right hand of the way, over againſt Lilburn; the outward line contained about an acre of ground, within which was a mount like the keep of an old caſtle, ſurrounded with a trench, and over againſt it the ground raiſed like a half-moon, whoſe horns entered the other trench. I heard of no other name for it than The Round Hill. The river Avon runs near it on the North. A mile farther, in the valley, ſtands another houſe called New-Inn alſo, but of antienter ſtanding than the former, and diſtinguiſhed only by its lying under Shawell. Mine hoſt told me, it had been an abbey called Holywell. Here ſpying ſome ſmall trenches lately made to drain the adjacent meadow, I went to them, and found many pieces of Roman brick and tile caſt up, and they ſay that Roman coin is found thereabouts; but though I have met with none there, nor in all my journey, yet have I left word with divers to lay up for me what they ſhall hereafter find. About a mile hence there is a tumulus[2] raiſed in the very middle of the highway, which methought was worth obſerving; but from thence to High Croſs I ſaw nothing worthy taking notice of; but there (near the place where Foſs from Leiceſter and Watling-ſtreet from Weedon make a right angle) is the foundation (as I gueſs) of a Roman temple, about ſix yards long, and four yards broad; and where, they ſay, not long ſince, was a thing like a ſilver mace dug up (which the people will needs have to be the mayor's mace of the city when it ſtood); I ſuppoſe it might be ſome enſign of honour, or pontifical inſtrument, belonging to the prieſt, or uſed in ſacrifice. The long pole ſet up at this place, with four arms (directing the way from London to Weſt Cheſter, and from York to Briſtol), was erected by one Mr. Anthony Faunt, of Claybrook, who was, I hear, a lover of antiquities, with whom lived one Mr. Broxhorne, a great collector of the coins found hereabout; but what is become of him I could not learn. On the top, the date of its erection, viz. Sept. 14, 1640. Coming near Hinckley, I perceived the old way has been taken into Sketchley Field, and continued for a mile: from whence, till I came near the river Anchor, little was obſervable; but, about a bow-ſhot on this ſide the bridge, the old Roman way paſſes through the middle of a ſquare fortification, which contains about two acres of ground. This place deſerves ſome farther conſideration, it ſeeming to be ſituate at the very entrance of old Mandueſſedum[3]. Thence (a mile on the left hand) I could diſcern the tumulus upon Oldbury; but the day was too far ſpent to ride up to it. Being paſt a mile from Atherſton, methought Watling-ſtreet ſtruck an oblique line to Falkeſley; and though the woods denied me the help to judge, which the champain had afforded me, yet, by obſerving the poſition of the ſun, I was ſomething perſuaded to credit this my opinion; but I will not poſitively aver it, till I ſhall trace this way with a needle. From Falkeſley, I found the old way hold on very direct and viſible, till I came within half a mile of Etocetum, and there it is apparently cut off, or rather ſunk in the bogs, juſt when Ickenild-ſtreet croſſes it; ſo that the preſent road takes upon the right hand, and about half a mile farther enters the old way again at Wall. Thus far I traced, and viewed what now ſeems obſervable in this antient Roman way (with thoſe parts of it wherein two others of the antient Roman roads croſs it); and now let me farther tell you, that looking back from the highway, over againſt Round Hill, towards New Inn, I diſcerned the track to be a little arched, and inclining North-weſt, which adds ſome ground to your opinion, that the courſe of Watling-ſtreet is ſomewhat bending through Warwickſhire. The like arch, I obſerved to be from the place where we croſſed this ſtreet-way, from Newnham to Lutterworth; and both theſe proſpects were about four miles in length. However, I could not diſcern the leaſt variation from a ſtrait line in any other part of the way; but there, I confeſs, the wood grew on me too faſt, and cut the proſpect too ſhort, to make my obſervation ſo exact as I did in the champain; and therefore I muſt wait for a clearer ſatisfaction, till the needle determines it. It has created ſome wonder in me ſince, how ſuch an eminent road, ſo ſtrait, ſo ſolidly founded with ſtones and gravel, and its ridge ſo firmly raiſed, ſhould become ſo much neglected; whereas there is not a more boggy and rotten road than in that other (when the old one is forſaken) almoſt to Coventry. Beſides, in my opinion, the journey from Weedon to Lichfield, through Watling-ſtreet, is ſhorter by three or four miles, than if you go by Coventry.

E. Ashmole, April 20, 1657.

V. Remarks on the Foss Road, by the Rev. Dr. Pegge.

One of the moſt conſiderable Roman roads was the Foſs-way, which, coming from the South-weſt, pointed North-eaſt. 'Quarum viarum,' ſays Higden, 'prima et maxima Foſſa dicitur ab Auſtro in Boream extenſa, quæ incipit ab angulo Cornubiæ apud Toteneſſe, et terminatur in fine Scotiæ apud Cateneſſe[4].' This is taken from Jeffrey of Monmouth[5], who pretends it was originally made by Belinus, long before the Romans had any concern with our iſland. But Jeffrey, or rather his Britiſh original, is as wrong in the direction of the Foſs-way as he is in the maker of it: and Ranulf Higden corrects him accordingly: 'Verius tamen ſecundum alios incipit in Cornubiâ, tendenſque per Devoniam, Somerſete, juxta Tetteburiam, ſupra Cotteſwold, juxta Coventriam, uſque Leiceſtriam procedit, indeque per vaſta plana verſus Newark progrediens, diutius apud Lincolniam terminatur.' This road, which he ſays came from Leiceſter by way of Newark to Lincoln, occurs in the 6th Iter of Antoninus, where it is part of the road, which comes from London to Lincoln by way of Leiceſter."

---

[1] "Our Antiquaries are much at a loſs, after torturing of words and languages, to find out the reaſon of the name of this ſtreet, which is ſo notorious, that many other bye-roads of the Romans, in different parts of the kingdom, have taken the ſame, and it became almoſt the common appellative of ſuch roads. My judgement of it is this: it is natural to denominate great roads from the places they tend to, as the Icening-ſtreet from the Iceni: the Akeman-ſtreet is ſaid to come from Akemanceſter: in Wiltſhire and in other places, the way to Exeter they call the Exeter road, though a hundred miles off: ſo the London road is every where inquired for as the moſt remarkable place: thus Watling-ſtreet, tending directly to Ireland, no doubt was called the Iriſh road, that is the Gathelian road, Gathelin-ſtreet; whence our preſent word Wales from Gauls, warden from guardian, &c." VI. EXCURSION from NEWARK in NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, along the FOSS ROAD[1], to HIGH CROSS in LEICESTERSHIRE, in October 1791, by Mr. THROSBY.

Theſe two places are diſtant from each other about 47 miles in a right line; and the intermediate ſpace contains part of one of the four great military works executed by the Romans, while this country was under their dominion.

If Camden imagined that the world would laugh at his folly in traverſing the Watling-ſtreet road (another Roman work), "purpoſely to ſeek out towns of ſpecial memory;" what muſt I expect, who undertook this journey, through mire and clay, in the month of October, without having an equal motive; becauſe the ſtations, or Roman towns, from Newark, are now either pretty well aſcertained, or not to be now recovered?

Many perſons have written largely and decidedly concerning theſe Itinera, who have never ſeen them. Others have ſeen them, like myſelf, partially, and have particularized the whole. My account is confined to general obſervations, which an actual view of its preſent ſtate ſuggeſted, as deſtitute of conjecture as, it may be thought by ſome, of real importance.

After the paſſing of almoſt 2000 years, we may readily conceive how much it muſt have ſuffered in its form and magnitude. In ſpite of encroachment, dictated by avarice, it ſtill remains a monument of honour and high antiquity: its courſe, the diſtance I have travelled it, may be traced with eaſe, even where the lord of the manor has by incloſure called it his own.

The annexed plan of the Foſs road[2], which I have laid down from obſervations on this journey (not from a ſurvey according to mathematical rules and inſtruments, but chiefly from appearance), I flatter myſelf, is done with ſome degree of accuracy. It will ſhew the reader, at one view, the courſe it takes through the country, and it will ſerve alſo as a reference to the general remarks which follow. From the 12th mile to the 36th, and from the 40th to the 46th, is now a gravel road.

I began this route, in October 1791, at Newark, which is ſuppoſed to be the Roman AD PONTEM, and lies on the Foſs from Lincoln. In vain have the learned ſtruggled to remove Ad Pontem hence, and to fix it at Southwell, and I know not where. Arguments, however, it muſt be allowed, ſeem more in favour of Southwell than Newark, although the former lies at more than three miles diſtance from the Road, over the Trent. Here Roman coins and pottery have been frequently found; but Newark, which was built ſo lately as the reign of king Stephen, is deſtitute of thoſe honourable tokens of antiquity.

The road from Newark to Thorp bar, at the diſtance of about four miles, is ſpacious, on a level country, paſſing through the lordſhip of Farndon to Thorp lane-end. When nearly oppoſite to Thorp bar, you are in view of Southwell minſter, on the right, over the Trent, which ſerpentines delightfully hereabouts. Here, we are told, was formerly a bridge over the Trent to Southwell (though now not a veſtige of it remains); near which ſtood a ſmall ſtation, it is imagined, as a protection to the paſſage over it. At Stoke, a little farther on the road, perhaps half a mile, there is every appearance of the ſite of a large antient building, which might eaſily command the bridge. It is on a bold eminence, near the church[3], and overlooks the Trent. The ground on the ſummit of this eminence lies in ridges, over more than an acre of land; it is an admirable ſituation for a caſtle, and commands a great extent of country. It is called The Hall Cloſe, and places near it are called (why I know not) Stoke-red-gutter, and The Blind Mare's Steps. Neither Newark nor Southwell anſwer with reſpect to diſtance ſo well as this place. In the table from Margidunum to Ad Pontem it is put down ſeven miles, to which the bridge, ſuppoſed to have been over the Trent to near Thorp bar, Southwell, anſwers nearly. The eminence at Stoke, and the place where the bridge ſtood, have a ſhort and eaſy communication.

Great part of the road between Stoke and Eaſt Bridgeford retains its antient and venerable tokens of furrowed age. The gorſe and black thorn ſpring from the uncultivated ſoil, and grow luxuriantly; and in ſome places the ſpreading oaks ſhade the paſſage, and intercept the ſight. Being confined, in conſequence, from viewing diſtant objects, the mind is naturally employed in contemplating the woody ſcenery with which this country abounded when the Romans made theſe memorable paſſages through it.

Nothing, in my opinion, can rob Eaſt Bridgeford of its Roman honours. Here you have the moſt indiſputable proofs of its high antiquity. An antient encampment; the name of barrow, which a place in this field ſtill retains; the diſcovery of Roman coins and Roman pottery; the diſtance from Willoughby, the next ſtation, agreeing exactly with the route; all together form ſuch ſtrong evidence as will admit of no objection to the general opinion, that Eaſt Bridgeford was the MARGIDUNUM of the Romans.

The road from the Foſs to the village is in a right line, very ſpacious, the length of more than half a mile. The village (or rather the lanes leading to it) is a labyrinth the way I entered it. The numerous paſſages, opening to the more numerous incloſures adjoining the village, miſguide you: the trees in the hedge-rows are lofty, numerous, and meet each other; which makes the lanes gloomy and miry, and ſome of them almoſt impaſſable.

From a kind of cliff, near the church, you command extenſive proſpects of the country over the Trent; near which commences the upper Foſs-way marked in the plan. I doubt not but moſt ſtations, which lay any way from the road, had another leſs-frequented paſſage, for nearneſs, in a direct line, from the ſtation to the main road. This occurs at Leiceſter.

At a place called Caſtle-hill, partly upon the main Foſs road oppoſite to this village, a labourer of this place, I was informed, by digging, diſcovered an earthen pot full of coins; but nobody could tell me even of what ſort they were. One of the oldeſt men in the village had heard of coins and other things of antiquity being found there, but had never ſeen any.

Hence, with the Reverend Mr. Anderſon, vicar of St. Nicholas, Leiceſter, I travelled to Bingham, which inclines about a mile and a quarter from the Foſs road; and next morning continued our route towards Willoughby, VERNOMETUM. The road from Newark to Bingham is all well gravelled; but from Bingham we found it, in many places, very indifferent indeed.

In ſome places the old pack-horſe road is ſtill viſible and uſeful, and in others it is grown over with graſs. When you have travelled a mile or two, the country on the left opens delightfully to view. Belvoir caſtle, as a diſtant object, with extenſive valleys at its baſe, ſits as a moſt noble creſt upon a broad ſhield. About four miles from Bingham, Nottingham, Wollaton-hall, &c. are pleaſing objects, and appear as if they were cloſe at hand.

About Cotgrave ſome very inconſiderate mind has juſt cauſed two horrid pits to be made, right acroſs the Foſs-road, at the diſtance from each other only five yards, to get lime-ſtone, as I am told, to mend the roads of a new encloſure. They are ſunk, ſquare and ſteep, to the depth of ſeven or eight feet. A traveller, in the night, could ſcarcely avoid falling into one of them, in which caſe his horſe and ſelf muſt inevitably periſh [1].

[1] Mr. Bartlett's plan of the Foſs Road, taken from the Hiſtory of Manceter (Mandueſſedum) is here annexed; ſee plate VI.

[2] Mr. Throſby's plan is alſo here given in plate VI.

[3] Sir George Bromley's ſeat is on the right of the church a few paces.

Near a lodge houſe, a little farther on, called Free-Maſons Arms, the following lordſhips join; Outhorp, Kinholton, Cotgrave, and Staunton: Clipſton and Widmerpool nearly meet them.

Beyond this lodge, the Foſs puts on a broad and venerable feature. The autumnal hue on the oaks, the black thorn, and wild ſhrubs which bound it, raiſed our ideas of its high antiquity.

Willoughby, the VERNOMETUM of the Romans, lies with a bend from the Foſs, but not now ſo eaſily to be traced as at the laſt ſtation; nor are there at Willoughby thoſe diſtinct and indiſputable marks of an intrenchment, or other military works, which are viſible at Eaſt Bridgeford. But here alſo the eminence overlooking the brook, and the Moſaic pavements and coins found there, as mentioned by the induſtrious Stukeley, are evidences ſufficient to eſtabliſh our belief that Willoughby was the Vernometum of the Itinerary.

Between Willoughby and Segs-hill is a conſiderable curve in the road, occaſioned doubtleſs by the viſible encroachments thereabouts; for farther on the Foſs is about 200 yards over [2], and here not 100. Near Segs-hill it is the broadeſt, conſiderably, between Newark and High Croſs, VENONES.

Near Segs-hill ſix lordſhips meet, viz. Ragdale, Old Dalby, Willoughby, Burton, Segrave, and Thruſſington. Segs-hill is in the pariſh of Dalby; and by ſome it has been imagined a ſmall ſtation, a thing not uncommon upon the Roman roads, near a grand ſtation, which lay at ſome diſtance from the road.

About a mile from this place you ſee all that is very eminent in the county to much advantage. The Foreſt hills form a grand line, linked to Buddon-wood; and, on the other hand, Burrow-hill, in a range of elevated ſtations, is chained, as it were, to Bilſden Copley. The villages below ſit in the happieſt order behind each other, backed by the handſome tower of Melton Mowbray. Theſe are ſeen to the beſt advantage about Thruſſington.

The line of the Foſs, near Radcliffe-on-the-Wreke, is very ſtrait, but uneven; you paſs over ſeveral lofty ſwells of the earth. The Daniſh tumuli in this lordſhip, mentioned by Mr. Carte, are at hand. The ground near is formed on one ſide not unlike the Rawdikes [3] at Leiceſter, but probably not a work of art, as they are.

Between this place and Syſton are ſome extenſive valley views, diverſified with pleaſing objects; Queneborough's beautiful ſpire is not the leaſt. Hence you paſs over an old bridge, which ſpans the Wreke, at the extremity of Syſton meadow. It appears to have wintered many a rough blaſt: and is now decrepid in its worn-out ſtumps, but they are not Roman.

In Syſton Liberty, through which the Foſs paſſes, the Road is ſtrangely diſmembered. The gripe of violence and power has ſeized it, and left the ſhadow for the ſubſtance; it is narrowed to a ſlender lane, the moſt filthy that ever man paſſed.

Hence we continued our route over the Nether Foſs road, through Thurmaſton, to Leiceſter, the RATÆ of the Romans. The other road ſhewn in the engraving continues in a ſtraight line near the Soar, by Burſtall, Belgrave, and Leiceſter abbey, to Danet's Hall, which is much croſſed by other roads near Leiceſter, and diminiſhed in many places by encroachments.

It would be needleſs to attempt to ſhew, and vanity in me to endeavour to prove, in this place, the great antiquity of Leiceſter. It is the undoubted and generally acknowledged RATÆ [4] in this route. Roman coins found here are innumerable; fragments of Moſaic pavement are dug up frequently, and Roman pottery. Strong foundations of old walls of amazing thickneſs, of foreſt ſtone, lie in all directions, and at great depths, in the old part of the town, towards the river. The Jewry Wall, and the milliary ſtone [5] now placed in Belgrave-gate, are ſtill viſible and moſt inconteſtible monuments of its Roman antiquity.

The Foſs to Redhouſe, on the Narborough road, is now but little frequented, and is much diſmembered, ſcarcely a trace of it in ſome places being left. The road from and to the ſtation was probably over the old river, near Braunſton gate; I have marked that paſſage in the plan.

The Foſs, from its junction [6] at Redhouſe, about a mile from Leiceſter, nearly to Enderby, is ſpacious except in one place, a little beyond the turnpike, on the right: there it has been lately much diminiſhed, and is ſhamefully narrow. Beyond Enderby alſo, in ſome places, it has been materially diminiſhed by former encroachments, which give it ſome aukward curves. Near Langham Bridges, which croſs the Soar, Croft Hill looks boldly. Theſe bridges, as they are called, or rather bridge, are an object of ſome note. They are built over a ſwampy part of the Foſs, and extend over two acres of ground. They, for their ſimplicity, muſt be regarded as the moſt antient work of labour, excepting the Foſs itſelf, between Newark and High Croſs. The arches are built of foreſt ſtone, without much deſign but that of durability. They are narrow, and without a fence or wall on either ſide; and in ſome places they ſo reſemble the rock itſelf, peeping through the moſs and ruſhes, jointed with ſuch admirable mortar, exhibiting through age the ſame feature as the ſtone, that you are at a loſs to know whether they be not ſome apertures in a rock, naturally favourable to the paſſage of the ſtream.

Beyond this bridge, towards Sutton, the Foſs puts on its wonted appearance, cloathed with its natural ornaments, the bramble, the thorn, and the oak; but it is not ſo ſpacious as at Segs-hill and Willoughby.

Beyond Sutton, at a place called Soar Mill (the firſt mill upon the river), it is almoſt choaked up.

Further on, it is almoſt loſt with incloſures, particularly about Froleſworth and Sharnford, and ſo on to High Croſs, which marked the ſite of the Roman VENONES, afterwards the city of CLEYCESTER; but which is now itſelf a ruin, ſtricken by lightning the latter end of the ſummer of 1791, when the annexed ſketch of it was taken by the late Mr. John Robinſon of Hinckley.

[1] I hope, before this caution meets the public eye, the author of ſuch an indiſcreet act will be made ſenſible of the danger which awaits a night traveller, that ſome preventative may be applied.

[2] This is a vaſt breadth indeed, when our broadeſt modern roads are only ordered to be 60 feet; can any one wonder that, in ſo rich and valuable a ſoil, it ſhould be pared away on both ſides on an incloſure taking place? Care, however, ſhould have been taken that the narrowed road ſhould be properly mended. G. A.

[3] See what is ſaid on theſe famous veſtiges of antiquity in the early part of the hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. *4; and ſee an admeaſurement of them in plate VI.

[4] Where the towns exiſted before the road, the latter, if the towns were at a conſiderable diſtance from its general bearing, turned out of its ſtraight courſe to go down to them—regaining, on leaving ſuch towns, its old bearing as ſoon as poſſible:—Where the towns were near it, it threw off at paſſing ſuch towns a branch at right angles to them. In general, the towns which are of a Roman form, and which ſtand on the military ways, were ſtations erected by themſelves, bearing perhaps the name of the Britiſh towns, though not ſtanding preciſely on the ſame ſpot which they did. Thus the Romans removed the preſent Wincheſter from Old Wincheſter; Carliſle from Old Carliſle; Colcheſter from Lexden; and Caiſtor near Norwich from Taeſboro; and I have great reaſon to doubt whether the preſent Leiceſter is the ſite of the Britiſh town, though it was certainly that of the Romans.—Q. was not therefore Ratby, or Rawdikes, the antient town? T. LEMAN.

[5] I reckon the milliary ſtood near the word Thurmaſton in the plan, or two miles from Ratæ along the Northern diverticulum. Vernometum too and Margidunum ſeem to ſtand off the direct line, as I believe was the general practice: and ſo Dr. Ch. Maſon thought moſt, if not all, the great towns did, in the road from Colcheſter to Weſt Cheſter. G. A.

[6] This, I ſuppoſe, means the Southern diverticulum. G. A.

VII. Obſervations on the Foſs and VIA DEVANA, by the Rev. THOMAS REYNOLDS.

"An opinion prevails very generally at Leiceſter, that the Foſs-road did not paſs through the town, but left it about a quarter of a mile, paſſing behind Weſt-cotes, and cloſe by Danet's hall, and afterwards, at no great diſtance, by the abbey, going towards Belgrave, and reſuming its line again ſomewhere near Thurmaſton. But this has the appearance of a traditional error, if we examine the map, which affords much better evidence than even perſonal inſpection in ſuch matters, becauſe it ſhews the line of the road cleared from thoſe little irregularities which ſeem conſiderable to the eye in viewing a mile or two, but are nothing as parts of a great whole. By the map, the line comes from High Croſs on the one ſide direct to the Weſt bridge. A bend in the road at Narborough was occaſioned by its being more convenient for the turnpike-road to paſs through the village; but the line of it is well known. From Segs-hill to Thurmaſton the courſe of it could not well be ſtraiter; and it continues the ſame from Thurmaſton to Leiceſter, coming along the ſtreet called Belgrave gate, to the point where formerly ſtood the Eaſt gate. It is much more natural to think it would paſs through a town of ſuch eminence as the antient Ratæ, rather than by it; and there might be another reaſon for it, which muſt have been the convenience of paſſing the river; for, though bridges might not be ſo common in the Roman times as now, it cannot be thought they would neglect thoſe conveniences in the neighbourhood of their ſtations, which might have, in the winter ſeaſon at leaſt, very frequently brought them into great hazard, by their not being able to aſſiſt each other on account of the floods. The road by Danet's hall being a branch of the great road, however, might take its name; and ſo it certainly has done, and retained it ſo effectually as to have blotted out the remembrance of the antient courſe of the road, did not the line in the map enable us to correct the error.

If I recollect right, Dr. Stukeley is of opinion, that the walls of Ratæ occupied nearly the ſame ground as the walls of the old town of Leiceſter[1]; and the approach of the Foſs to the Eaſt and Weſt gates, and of the Gartre road to another point in the wall, ſeems to ſupport this opinion. I perfectly remember being told by my father, when I was a boy, and the very firſt time I was at Leiceſter, that a gate of the old town ſtood where is now the Lion and Lamb inn. I have not been able to find any trace of this tradition now in being; but ſo large a road, as the Gartre muſt have been in antient times, coming to that very point, gives room to think the tradition not wholly without foundation.

GARTRE ROAD is a very antient road, which leaves Leiceſter with the road to London through Harborough, but does not proceed with it more than a mile; the London road turns out of it to the right a little beyond the turnpike-gate. The Gartre road originally was the public road from this point to the Strettons; but the line has ſuffered ſome interruption by the incloſure of the village of Knighton, and the communication with it is now made to point to that village; this cauſes the bend which brings it to the London road, but there is no doubt of its antient courſe. The general direction of it is to the South-eaſt, and it runs for more than ten miles in a ſtrait line. This, with the circumſtance of its paſſing through two ſmall towns of the name of Stretton, leaves no room to doubt of its claim to Roman antiquity. Other circumſtances confirm this. It keeps its line, as appears by the map, nearly to the village of Glooſton, when its courſe is perhaps interrupted by the hills in that neighbourhood. When the line appears again, it bears to the right round the mere of Slawſton field by the ſide of Welham cloſes, and keeps along, by the meadows, towards Medbourn, at which village a teſſellated pavement was diſcovered ſome few years ago; alſo in Aſhby field, which is immediately on the other ſide the Welland, bricks, and appearances of antient foundations, have been broken up in ploughing. T. R."

The following obſervations on the Roman Milliary were communicated by Mr. REYNOLDS in 1794, long after Mr. ASHBY'S Eſſay (p. clv.), and the former remarks of Mr. REYNOLDS and ſeveral other gentlemen (in the early part of the Hiſtory of Leiceſter, p. 5.) had been committed to the preſs.

Mr. Aſhby makes the height 3 feet 5½ inches; whence I ſuſpected that the ſtone had been ſhortened in the putting up in its preſent poſition; but the maſon who fixed it aſſured me that it had not been cut, nor had any alteration whatever been made in it, except the pieces of new ſtone ingrafted in it to fill up the breaches, and which are very diſcernible. This was confirmed by the diſtances between the top and firſt line, and bottom and laſt line, which very nearly agree with the dimenſions given by the learned Preſident. [See plate VI.]

The line near the P, I cannot think a part of the letter, as its form does not agree with the reſt of the inſcription. The Mark under the E appears original, but may be only a blemiſh from ſome external injury. The ▽ at the end of the line repreſents a large piece of new ſtone.

Length of ſecond line,	2 f. 8 i.

On a very nice examination, I perceived ſome remains of the I in DIV; but it is ſo faint, that I before thought there was no letter. Mr. Aſhby makes DIV at the end of this line, but no traces now remain of the IV.

"T that begins the third line," ſays Mr. Aſhby, "is very faint;" but not the leaſt trace can now be ſeen. The paint upon the ſtone may poſſibly have obliterated the faint appearance of this letter. At the end of this line, the ſame ingenious obſerver has placed the letters AVG; but I cannot perceive any remains of them. A waving line has been ſuppoſed part of A; but as no letter now viſible has any but ſtraight lines, the different form ſeems a ſtrong objection. The fourth line is ſomewhat longer than the ſecond about two inches.

O in CoS,	— —	0	1½

The T in Ratis, at firſt view, ſeems ſhorter than the other letters; but, on a more careful examination, the upper part of it is very plain to be ſeen, though the lines are very faint. The ſuppoſed tranſverſe in the middle of the letter is a blemiſh from ſome external cauſe.

The line, which joins the numerals, 2½ inches long.

The ſhaded lines at the bottom ſhew the new pieces of ſtone, which have been added at the time it was ſet up in Leiceſter.

Mr. Aſhby's conjecture, as to the inſcription being imperfect, ſo naturally accounts for the letters on the back of the ſtone, that I entirely agree with him; though, from my own obſervation, I was before of a different opinion, as there are no traces of a ſingle letter in the whole ſpace.

I have added, in ſimilar-ſhaped characters, the letters ſuppoſed to be loſt. If PM ſupplied the place of PP in the third line, the AVG muſt have been written cloſer together. The EP ranges exactly with the ſecond line, and the B with the third. By this addition, the H appears in the centre of this inſcription. T. R. 1794."

Eſſay on the Roman Milliary, by the Rev. GEORGE ASHBY, B. D.

President of St. John's College, Cambridge.

(Written in 1772; printed in 1793.)

In July, 1771, the workmen digging to form a rampart for a new turnpike-road from Leiceſter to Melton, found, near Thurmaſton, an heap of Charley, or Charnwood, foreſt ſtones[1] ſet in lime, both ſo hard as almoſt to baffle their eagerneſs to demoliſh it in hopes of finding a treaſure. Preſently they diſcovered a very large cylindrical ſtone lying by it, and for which the other had ſerved as a baſe, or foundation. They perceived no letters on it, nor any thing elſe to raiſe their curioſity; ſo let it lie neglected by the road ſide. Mr. Goodrich, a gentleman of Thurmaſton, who thought it would make him a good roller, carried it off without ſaying any thing to any body; and in his yard it lay for ſome time; and there Dr. Percy[2], who was on a viſit, ſaw it; when a report getting abroad of there being letters on it, Mr. Pochin, one of the commiſſioners of the turnpike, claimed it as materials for mending the road; and, ſending their ſurveyor with a cart, brought it away to the turnpike-houſe garden in Thurmaſton-lane, where it was thrown down, and in that condition lay for ſome time. The ſpot in which it was found is about a cloſe's diſtance from Thurmaſton Weſtward, not far from where the preſent road to Leiceſter divides from the Foſs. The ſtone is a remarkable hard one, ſo that a piece of it towards the bottom, broken off by a mower, ſerved him for a rubſtone to whet his ſcythe; is thick ſet throughout its ſubſtance with white chryſtalline grains of the ſize of a middling pin's head; which ſeem ſtill harder than the ſtone, by their appearing every where protuberant on the ſurface. It is not however free from long flaws, or cracks, (like what are ſeen on bronze medallions) occaſioned by ſlight vacuities, which occur between the different concretions: a remarkable one begins at the top of the ſtone, and runs ſlanting through the final S of the firſt line; but others exactly ſimilar are in the bottom of the ſtone, &c. where there are no letters. The maſons affirm that it muſt have been brought from Derbyſhire[3]. This circumſtance, and the care taken to form the foundation of ſuch good materials, ſhews the attention the Romans paid to duration, even in ſmall matters.

In September, 1771, I paſſed twice within 200 yards of it, in going between Leiceſter and Derby, without knowing any thing of it. In November Dr. Farmer laid two copies of the inſcription before me, and afterwards a third; all of them taken by different gentlemen from actual examination, and differing from one another no more than uſual: but they were ſpaced out, and accompanied with an interpretation in common letters at length of the abbreviated words, without any ſuſpicion that their original was defective[4]: yet I quickly perceived that in all of them the latter half nearly of every line muſt be ſupplied, to make it conſiſtent with ſenſe, and the uſual forms. The Roman capitals expreſs what I received; the Italic what I found neceſſary to be ſupplied. The variations in the ſeveral copies are neglected, the deſign being only to repreſent the whole I received.

CORIT. M. P. or COR. M. PAS.

A copy of this, ſo ſupplied, I furniſhed Dr. Farmer with; and deſired the favour of him to ſend it into the country, in order, if poſſible, to determine what ſupport the ſtone itſelf gave to the conjecture; which was the leſs to be expected, becauſe the ſtone was known to be cylindrical; for had it been of the uſual tablet-form, we might have ſuppoſed, that half of it was broken off, and not yet diſcovered. I ſhewed it myſelf to two gentlemen of the neighbourhood, and deſired them to procure me, beſides exact copies traced out on the ſtone, a caſt in plaſter of Paris of the ſtone itſelf. Dr. Farmer alſo tranſmitted the ſame requeſt to his friends, with the minute directions I wrote down for doing it properly, and without injuring the ſtone. In May the Rev. Mr. Greenaway[5] informed me, that he had had a caſt taken for me ſo long ago as January 1772; but which I did not receive till July for want of convenient carriage; and that, by rolling the ſtone itſelf about, he had diſcovered, at 13 inches diſtance from the end of the ſecond line, \EP; and under theſe letters in the next line TR, or ſomewhat like thoſe letters. This ſufficiently confirmed what before was only conjectured would prove to be the real appearance; and the reaſons for thinking ſo were,

1. Becauſe PONT MAX almoſt always appears with the other titles till long after Hadrian: and once alone.

2. That in the numerous ſimilar inſcriptions in Gruter, vol. I. p. ccxlviii. & ſeqq. the emperor's relationſhip to Nerva is rarely omitted; though that to his immediate predeceſſor Trajan ſometimes is, as in N° 4. of both pages.

3. Trajan, in his life-time, is indeed called DIVVS on an inſcription in Spain; Journal des Scavans, from Pere Zacharie, Juillet, 1772, p. 343. If there are no other inſtances of himſelf, or of ſome of the other emperors, his predeceſſors, being called ſo, I ſhould ſuſpect it to be a modern forgery, or the blunder of the workmen. So of that in Gruter, xlvi. 1. "In ruinis caſtrorum Trajani Warkel. Deo Herculi pro ſalute Divi Trajani Auguſti et Marcianæ ſororis Aug. Colonia Dac. Sarmiz."

4. Becauſe DIV would not be aſcribed to Hadrian in his life-time.

5. Nor would his other titles, which were temporary, and floating, during life, be mentioned after his deceaſe.

6. Becauſe his titles run exactly in the uſual manner by means of the inſertions. See P. S. p. clviii.

I muſt add, that theſe reaſons weighed ſo much with me, that, joined to the appearance of A RATIS, which figured ſo plainly in all the copies, I had the hardineſs to aſſert peremptorily, that unleſs the ſupplemental reading I propoſed was ſupported by the ſtone, I ſhould be apt to conclude, that ſome wag had taken advantage of the intended digging to lay a trap for the provincial antiquaries; but had, as often happens, not ſkill enough to manage matters ſo as to prevent diſcovery. But the ſize, and rarity, of the ſtone, with the inattention of the neighbourhood to theſe matters, might have cleared them from all ſuch charges; which the ſight of the ſtone will ſufficiently do at any time; whoſe actual appearance, when I ſaw it, 16th and 18th of May, 1772, was nearly as follows[6]:

	ft.	in.
Height, —	3	5½
Circumference, —	5	7
Height of whole inſcription,	1	7
Length of inſcription from beginning of D in ſecond line to end of detached P.	4	1
Length of gap, or vacancy, in ſecond line between end of DIV and beginning of \E,	1	1

[1] The lime of Barrow, from an hard dark blue ſtone, is reckoned the beſt in England.

[2] Now biſhop of Dromore.

[4] A common caſe. See Horſley, pp. 256. 231. 286. 290. 300. & Gruter paſſim. However, none of them was ſo faulty as that in Gent. Mag. for January, 1773.

[6] For the ſhape of Roman milliary ſtones, ſee Horſley, Pref. p. xii. where, it is remarkable, that no mention is made of thoſe erected under Hadrian any where: and though Scotland xxv is ſaid to be in the form of ours, yet it has ſome mouldings; whereas ours is as plain, and large, as the biggeſt rolling ſtones for gardens, and juſt like that figured in Grævii Antiq. Rom. 657. omitting entirely the little column ſtuck on the top.

	ft.	in.
From the top of the ſtone to firſt line	0	2½
From bottom to laſt line,	1	2
Firſt[1] row of letters in height —	0	3¼
The three next rows, each 3 inches,	0	9
Diſtance between each row nearly 1½ inch.	0	6
	3	3¼

The five laſt meaſurements were taken only by a common rule, and are not exact; as the whole height of the ſtone exceeds the meaſure of the parts by 2½ inches.

The inſcription on the ſtone is really as in the engraving, fig. 7. Pl. II. The letters are right as to height, being reduced, according to Horſley's ſcale, to $\frac{1}{8}$ of what they are on the ſtone; but the height of the whole ſtone ſhould have been 5 inches $\frac{3}{16}$: the loſs, however, is only in the bottom, or blank part: the width too, or breadth, i. e. whole circumference of ſtone, is 1 inch ¾ too ſhort; ſo the outline doth not give an exact idea of ſize, and ſhape, as intended.

T that begins third line is very faint, the ſtone being worn away: at the end of all the lines it is ſo much ſo, as to have eraſed the letters effectually; owing probably to the ſtone's having fallen down; and, before it got buried in the earth, this part lying uppermoſt was damaged by the wheels of waggons, and feet of cattle, going over it; luckily the great length of the lines has preſerved ſome of the final letters; by which it alſo appears, that the inſcription filled the 67 inches of the circumference, all but 8 inches: ſo a faithful drawing of the ſtone cannot repreſent the whole inſcription at one view; as even the firſt line, which is ſo much the ſhorteſt, but in larger letters, is too long to be ſeen at one ſtation. As this is neither the uſual practice, nor moſt convenient form, may we not ſuppoſe it happened becauſe the ſtone ſtood at the very forking off of two ways; where the traveller might move round, and read without much inconvenience?

The moſt remarkable letters are, R in IMR, whoſe laſt, or ſlanting, ſtroke is waved; the D is remarkably broad; the A in AVG. remarkably narrow; M and not M in TRAM, i.e. middle part comes leſs than half way down, inſtead of to the bottom: the ſmall o in PoT and CoS is uſual: the reaſon might be to gain room; but this will by no means account for the diminutive ſize of T in RATIS; as the raiſing it above its fellows, and as it ſtands three times in the ligatures, anſwers that end more effectually.

If the firſt line ſtood in the middle, then ſome letters are plainly wanting, perhaps ARI; but as, in two ſimilar ones for Hadrian, in Gruter CLVI. 1. & 2. it is wrote CAESAR. & Horſley, Scotl. IV. where was full room for inſerting I, and where the words are remarkably written at length, ſo it might be here. Horſley, p. 232, deſcribing a very rude inſcription to Conſtantine the Great, which begins, as ours, IMR, ſays, the R, which is very plain, is either a miſtake for P, or elſe a deſigned contraction of IMPER for imperatoris: in the ſame two letters of another word, p. 290, Mr. Ward ſuppoſes, "that either there has been a ſmall E between PR, which is now defaced; or that it was deſigned to be put there, but was forgotten, as it eaſily might be:" perhaps it might have been in the pattern PER, which might be new, and not underſtood by the workmen, and ſo neglected: it may have been ſo here; or perhaps in all CAESAR (as MEMORAM in Horſley, p. 192. No 75. 1.), which the workman not underſtanding, but ſuppoſing it to be the nominative caſe, altered alſo the IMP of his copy into IMR, to agree with it; (though I do not know that ſuch an abbreviation was ever uſed): and, if ſo, it will account for what he thus adds of his own being of a different form from the ſame letter elſewhere, viz. R and not R; ſo too, when by a blunder, which a Roman workman, who could read his letters, could hardly be guilty of, he wrote TRAMN inſtead of TRAIAN, which had occurred before; it is remarkable, that he writes M and not M: in both caſes, perhaps, deſerting his pattern, and following his own fancies[2].

There can be little doubt of the word wanting in the ſecond line, viz. NERVAE; and by trials with letters of the ſize applied to the vacancy, it was probably written NERV, or NERV, or NERVÆ; the laſt word is plainly NEP, for NEPos. In an inſcription to Severus (Horſley, Northumb. CXIII.) is NRVADNEP for NERVÆ ADNEPos.

The third line, perhaps, was PM. TRIB or TRIB; or P. M. P. P. TRIB. Horſley, Cumb. X.

The completing the fourth line is more uncertain: if it meant to expreſs only miles, that was ofteneſt done by M. P. which will not fill the line: perhaps it was M. PASSVS; yet there is MIL. P. III. Horſley; Scotland, XXVI. but this is rare; and I think, in general, they declined uſing MIL. except for what occurred ſo often, a ſoldier. I ſee no inſtances of MIL. PAS.

In Hercules Prodicius, Steph. Vign. Pighii, Antwerpiæ, 1587, 8vo, p. 497, is an inſcription to Antoninus Pius happily reſtored, though more difficult than ours, becauſe imperfect at the beginning, and end too, of every line.

I am afraid I have been too minute in relating the circumſtances which peculiarly belong to this ſtone. But I did it becauſe we have few exact hiſtories of the firſt finding of any of our Britiſh ſtones, except the Chicheſter one, and a few more. I ſhall be ſhort concerning thoſe circumſtances which it has in common with others, ſuch as the titles of Hadrian, for which ſee Gruter, CCXLVIII. 8. CLIV. 6. which is ſuppoſed to be the central mile-ſtone in Rome, from whence all the ways commenced their meaſurement, only becauſe a large I appears exactly under the chapiter[3]. But this is doubtful. How could it, if central, be numbered I? Beſides, the numeration at firſt by Gracchus began from the city gates, much like our preſent ones; but thus the whole city was, and is, neglected: Auguſtus, to remedy this, ſet up, in the middle of Rome, a milliare aureum; which this can hardly be called for it's braſs ball only, even ſuppoſing that was once gilded: nor could it well ſtand in the centre, and mean to ſay, that it was juſt one mile to all the gates, or beginning terminus of the original ſtones, as that ſpace muſt vary in different inſtances, and in all was probably greater than one mile: it might, however, be one of the many that ſurrounded the central one, in the ſeveral directions, at one mile diſtance. Pliny, N. H. iii. 5. fixing the ſize of Rome, ſays, "menſurâ currente a miliario in capite fori Romani ſtatuto." Yet a braſs ball looks diſtinguiſhing; and, if not a modern addition, perhaps all within the walls were thus ornamented, and numbered ſimply I. &c. to diſtinguiſh them from the original ones without the walls, which were marked, "Primus ab urbe," &c.

[1] Horſley, p. 307, obſerves of the inſcription, Yorkſh. VI. that the letters are of the largeſt ſize, being above four inches high; and p. 227, North. LV. remarks the unequal ſize of the letters in different lines.

[2] The liſt of ſuch blunders forms an article in Horſley's Index, ch. XV. and might be enlarged from his excellent work; and ſo ſhould the liſt of abbreviations. V. Inſtituzione Lapidaria.

[3] One for the ſame purpoſe has been lately ſet up in Paris; and ſuch an one ſhould be fixed in London; and no where more properly than at the interſection of the four ways, Eaſt, Weſt, North, and South, at the bottom of Ludgate-Hill, with the diſtances to the Land's end every way. Such an obeliſk there would be the very thing; and if two circles, croſſing each other at right angles, were placed at top, this would ſhew that the menſuration began here. For a milliary, marked III; and this ſuppoſed central, or Golden, Milliary, both at Rome, ſee Blainville's Travels, vol. II. p. 451. 466.

Many milliaries occur in Gruter. See an uncommonly long, and circumſtantial one, to our emperor, on making a road from Carthage to Theveſte, in which the Legio III Auguſta was employed. Shaw's Travels, p. 156, fol. and 86, 4to. This, and an honorary one to him in the uſual form, p. 100, 4to, is the ſame as that quoted, from Phil. Tranſ.; only there is TH in CARTHAGINE, and THEVESTEN, not THEVESTEM; both probably right. Dr. Shaw ſaw it only on one column; Dr. Carlos on two. In Bergier, Hiſt. des Grands Chemins, i. 112, and ii. 209, are one and the ſame, though a little varied. See alſo i. 60, 61. 381.

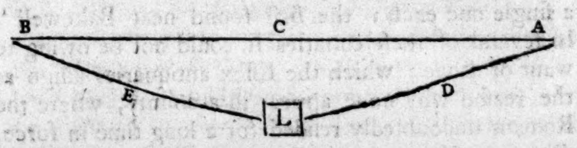
The Ligatures in our inſcription are ſimilar to thoſe in the famous Chicheſter one, Horſley, 183. 332, and in many others of as good times, which is contrary to his obſervation, p. 188. Even in one for Hadrian, Cumb. XLVI. in Mr. Horſley's opinion; ſo in that at Tunis, as before.

But the great, and peculiar, merit of our inſcription is, that it determines Leiceſter to have been RATÆ; as Ratis, in Antonine, Weſſeling, p. 477; Rate corion of Ravennas; Ratis corion of Richard, p. 39; and Ratis corion of Morton's Northamptonſhire, p. 503; and not Richard's Ragæ, p. 26; miſled perhaps by a very faulty, but antient, reading in Ptolemy of ΡΑΓΕ, or ΕΡΑΓΑΙ; nor yet COR. RAITORUM, as in Gruter DXXIV. 3. for a ſoldier of the Cohort of Ræti, or Raiti, ſee his Index[2]; but which is nothing to our town; about whoſe name later Antiquaries have been pretty unanimous; only Cellarius, in Geogr. Antiq. p. 270, calls Ragæ an obſcure place near Leiceſter; and Leland, Collectanea, vol. IV. p. 145, Ragæ, a toune and caſtelle, caullid Snottingham[1]. See Horſley, pp. 348. 360. 368. 375. 504; and Whitaker's Mancheſter, p. 150.

If any additional title of RATÆ, as COR, or CORIT. for Coritanorum (which Ravennas, &c. perhaps mean by RATECORION, &c.) is wanting after RATIS, the loſs is more material, but, I am afraid, irrecoverable from this ſtone; as I would almoſt venture to affirm, that, if ever the ſtone is ſet up, and exfoliated by the weather, no more traces of letters will be diſcovered by others, than by myſelf (when obliged to roll about ſo large a ſtone, to which the dirt adhered on that part where it had touched the earth, and lain for ſome time unmoved, juſt as it doth to a common rolling-ſtone; and, by its lying in a narrow concave alley, prevented my turning it quite round); and thoſe diſcovered by my learned friend, who examined it more at his leiſure, and eaſe. I have ſince ſeen it erect, but placed diſadvantageouſly in the corner of the turnpike-houſe garden under a tree; from whence a drizling rain dripped all the time I was taking a fac ſimile; which, however, was very exactly done, all but the few ſupplemental characters, which, it's ſituation did not allow me to get round and ſee. Yet, after all, I will not be poſitive, that the laſt marks of all may not have been III, though only II, connected by a faint waving ſtroke through the middle, appears now, as there is a ſmall accidental defect in the ſtone juſt before: but whether it was two, or three, miles one could wiſh might be ſettled, by meaſuring from where the ſtone ſtood to where the neareſt Roman gate may be ſuppoſed to have ſtood; or to the probable central part, or forum, within the walls. It proves however, that a Roman road was here in Hadrian's time, who died in A. D. 138, juſt where we have long believed the Foſs road went, and decorated with grand mile-ſtones[3]: whereas the earlieſt certain ones hitherto produced are for Philippus, A. D. 247; Gallus, 250; and Criſpus, 320; Horſley, p. 277, 278. 305; perhaps there may be an other or two uncertain ones, p. 328. 302; and Scotl. XXV. Pref. XII.; but not one of them all mentions a town's name, or the diſtance from any place, ſo as clearly to determine them to be milliaries.

I ſuppoſe this is what Mr. Horſley means, Pref. XII, where, after quoting Baſtide for the ſhape of milliaries, as they varied under different emperors, he ſubjoins, "that it is not uſual to cut the number of paces upon ſuch ſtones." This, I think, he ſhould have confined to the few that have been found in this iſle; for, on the continent, of which Baſtide ſpeaks, the number of paces is uſually expreſſed on ſtones that have been preſerved entire. But I doubt whether I underſtand Mr. Horſley rightly or no; perhaps "ſuch ſtones" means mural ones, but ſee pl. 1, 2, &c. If milliaries, in "not uſual," not ſhould be omitted. But as no poſitive mention is made by either of the ſhape, and ſize, of Hadrian's milliaries, ours may ſerve, till more appear, to ſettle that point.

But, beſides theſe uſes of our ſtone, its ſingularity of local ſituation renders it very remarkable, as it ſeems to prove the exiſtence of at leaſt one diverticulum from the Foſs to Leiceſter, whoſe diſtance it records; from whence the inference of a ſecond is natural; and which the following diagram points out:



A. Thurmaſton.
B. Towards Narborough.
C. Real Foſs by Belgrave turnpike.
D. and E. Eaſt and Weſt diverticula.
L. Leiceſter.

But it is not only its local merit that diſtinguiſhes it; its high antiquity is equally remarkable. Indeed, if we conſult Mr. Horſley's Index, ch. XVII. there ſeems to appear a regular ſucceſſion of inſcriptions for as many of the earlieſt emperors as one could well expect; but, upon turning to the places referred to, the ſcene changes wonderfully: the inſcriptions, for which the names of Claudius, Veſpaſian, and Domitian, are quoted, are only on pigs, or large pieces, of caſt lead[4], which are of a very different nature in their purport, and intended duration, from thoſe on ſtone: and himſelf obſerves, p. 183, that, notwithſtanding the deſcent of Julius Cæſar, the exploits, and conqueſts, of Claudius and Veſpaſian, in this iſland, and the wars that were carried on under ſome others, who ſucceeded, yet we have not one inſcription in Britain that undoubtedly belongs to any of the firſt twelve Cæſars. Nor do I forget the celebrated Chicheſter inſcription which doth not appear in the Index at all, and moſt probably belongs to Hadrian's reign, or even to that of Antoninus Pius, rather than to Claudius's, to whom the learned commentators, upon its firſt diſcovery, were willing to aſcribe it.

Plotina, in the Index, refers only to a battered female buſt, with an high head-dreſs of her time, but no imperial marks; for Trajan, Nor. LII. is quoted, becauſe there is POP, which he thinks may be read principis optimi; but, p. 225, he allows, that during Trajan's reign, the hiſtorians are ſilent as to Britain; and that the title (even if it is rightly thus read) is not inconſiſtent with ſeveral other reigns: accordingly we find Diocleſian called ſo; Gruter, CCLXXIX. p. 4.

We have thus cleared our way to Hadrian; and of him Mr. Horſley ſays, pp. 183. 49. 81. 84. that "his name is the firſt that occurs in any of our Britiſh inſcriptions; and that we have but very few of his, though he built a rampart quite croſs the country; and that the few erected to him are ſimple and ſhort:" that is, juſt ſuch as we might expect the earlieſt to be; and to which character all thoſe he was able to produce anſwer moſt exactly.

Two ſuch only are now extant, viz. one doubtful if his, Northumberland, LXXVII. p. 233; and a very mutilated one, Cumberland, XLVI. p. 270; and two, whoſe originals are loſt, pp. 271 and 305. This laſt may have contained the emperor's titles, juſt as the Leiceſterſhire doth: why they ſupply MAX after PARTHICI, I cannot tell: as he is generally called Divi Trajani Parthici F.

So ſhort, and imperfect, is the liſt of inſcriptions to Hadrian; although, from Horſley, pp. 79. 233. 258, it might be ſuppoſed, that ſuch were by no means uncommon in England; and accordingly, pref. p. XIV, he mentions one, as either of Hadrian, or Antonine, though there is hardly a ſhadow of reaſon for aſcribing it to the former. But the liſt, upon the whole, is ſo ſhort, as hardly to be worth excepting to; elſe I ſhould imagine that Northumberland LXXVII. was originally for Antonine; and this rarity of exiſting ones, when rightly made out, may make us at leaſt cautious how we admit thoſe, whoſe originals are loſt.

And as to abſolute rarity, if we eſtimate our treaſures in this branch of literature from Mr. Horſley's noble collection, we ſhall find that hardly 18 counties in England or Wales, have furniſhed inſcriptions on ſtone: Leiceſterſhire not one, nor any of its neighbouring counties; except Derbyſhire and Lincolnſhire, a ſingle one each; the firſt found near Bakewell [1]. In ſeveral of theſe counties it could not be owing to want of ſtone; which the Eſſex antiquaries aſſign as the reaſon why none appear in a county, where the Romans undoubtedly reſided for a long time in force, till one to Mercury was diſcovered ſo late as 1768, at, or near, Colcheſter, and which was in the poſſeſſion of my much eſteemed friend Charles Gray, eſq.

The great ſcarcity therefore of inſcribed ſtones even to Hadrian, the abſolute want of milliaries till many years afterwards, and the county, and even ſpot, in which our ſtone was found, all contributed to make it worthy of a ſafer repoſitory, than to be ſuffered to lie rolling about in a turnpike-houſe garden, which it did ſo late as Auguſt 1772. I could alſo wiſh that a ſtone was ſet up to mark the place where it was found, and where it's foundation ſtill is, though concealed under the new road; becauſe more foundations may ſome time or other be diſcovered; and it may be a ſatisfaction to meaſure the intermediate diſtance between them; which has never, that I know of, been yet done in England; though Mr. Wallis, in his Hiſtory of Northumberland, mentions two, or three, ſtones, as ſtanding. After all, we may well wonder, that no more inſcriptions to Hadrian ſhould appear in England; and, if the Foſs only had ſuch ponderous, and ſubſtantial, milliaries all along its ſide, as, from the preſent inſtance, one ſhould gueſs it had, it is ſtrange, that they ſhould all have ſo completely vaniſhed.

Having ſaid ſo much of the earlieſt Britiſh inſcriptions, allow me to add a word of the coins relating to that early period. The writer of the Univerſal Hiſtory, vol. XV. p. 162, (F.) 8vo, ſays, "From ſeveral antient coins we learn, that Hadrian viſited the following countries, Gaul, &c. No mention is made on any of the medals which have reached us, of Britain, Armenia, or Dacia; which provinces it is certain he viſited." If this general aſſertion is not to be confined to the want of ſuch with ADVENTVS AVG. on them, it is not true; for ARMENIA appears in the page of Onuphrius quoted, 177, l. 1; DACIA, at p. 175, l. 4; and BRITANNIA, at p. 177, l. 4; at p. 168, about middle; 174, laſt line; and 171, firſt line; and themſelves mention ſeveral ſuch, vol. XIX. p. 157. [O.] This uſeful work is by no means free from miſtakes in this branch of knowledge; and Mr. Horſley has entirely omitted it, though clearly within his plan, and title; but which, he probably was not much converſant in, if we may judge from the very ſlight account of the coins, which he mentions to be found at any place; and his quoting as true the coin of Geta, whoſe reverſe is COLONIA DIVANA, p. 85; which, notwithſtanding Mr. Camden's, and Dr. Leigh's poſitive aſſertions [2], and Dr. Gower's preſent opinion, may ſafely be rejected; nor indeed has it found a place in Mr. Camden's firſt plate of Roman coins. Nor has Dr. Henry, in his late Hiſtory, endeavoured to remedy this defect; as he ſeems to have contented himſelf with tranſcribing my learned friend Dr. Pegge's account of Britiſh coins, without ſaying a word even of the three Roman coins at the head of Mr. Camden's plate, which are ſuppoſed to relate to Britain; of which that with two men fighting from Oiſelius Sel. Num. Tab. XXXVIII. p. 3. is probably falſe (as unlike the Roman coins, and mentioned in no other cabinet); and, if not, has nothing to determine it to Britain; the next of Camulodunum is equally unſupported as Divana above mentioned; though ſeriouſly quoted by Triſtan, and Reimar. Dio c. n. 53; and by the learned author of the very uſeful "Inſtituzione Numiſmat." p. 109, 8vo; and the third is a Greek one, in the uſual ſtyle and form, coined in compliment to Britannicus, at Nicomedia, the metropolis of Bithynia, under Aulus Mindius Balbus, the proconſul; this was firſt traveſtied from a very imperfect ſpecimen into a coin of a king of London by Bolton, in his Nero Cæſar, p. 134; for which exploit he is much admired by Mr. Evelyn on Medals, p. 51; by Mr. Hearne, in Leland's Collect. vol. IX. p. 63; and by W. Burton at large, on Antonine's Itinerary, p. 158. See this coin, and others like it, better explained, by Harduin Num. Popul. ad v. Nicomedia. Spanheim, vol. I. p. 590; vol. II. pp. 592, 593; and, beſt of all, by Vaillant Num. Græc. p. 13 and 15; Hiſtoria Parthorum, tom. II. p. 369, 8vo, and with a figure by Morell, Theſ. Conſul. under Mindia, and Theſ. Imperat. vol. II. p. 54. 56. tab. XII. of Claudius, N° 3. and 4. How any body could miſtake a coin of Greek workmanſhip and letters, for one of an imaginary king of London, is, at this time of day, hardly conceivable, and ſhould at leaſt be contradicted. But juſt ſo a common denarius, DOMITIANVS CAESAR AVG, is traveſtied into CALCARAUCI, and ſaid to mean Tadcaſter [3].

P. S. There are two Latin inſcriptions to our emperor in Fleetwood's Sylloge, p. 39, N° 4, and p. 103, N° 2, and a Greek one in Wetſtein's New Teſtament, vol. THE RIVERS AND NAVIGATIONS OF LEICESTERSHIRE.

In 1373, the inhabitants of the county of Leiceſter joined with thoſe of Warwick, Northampton, Rutland, Bedford, Buckingham, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, in petitioning parliament, that Lynn might be made a ſtaple town, as being much more convenient to them for the conveyance of their goods and merchandize, on account of the many rivers and ſprings of freſh water which flowed directly towards Lynn from various parts of the ſaid ſeveral counties:

The parliament agreed to the requeſt, on condition that Yarmouth ſhould alſo continue to be a ſtaple town.

"Monſtrent ſes humbles & liges communes des counteez de Warwyk, Leyceſtre, Northampton, Roteland, Bedeford, Bukyngham, Cauntbrugge, & Huntyngdon, qe come divers rivers d'ewes douces qe ſe tendont droitment tan q̃ la ville de Lenn, ſont coſteantz as ditz counteez en diverſes lieux; par qui les ditz communes purroient eaſement ov petit traveille & coſtages carier lour leyns & autres marchandiſes appurtenantz a l'eſtaple tan qe al dit port de Lenn', as moutz meindres coſtages & traveilles qe de les carier nul part aillours a aſcun autere eſtaple: Par q̃i ſupplient les ditz communes, qe pleiſe a lour dit Sr̄ le Roi, en eaſe & allegeance des grauntz coſtages & treveiles des ditz communes, de granter comūne paſſage & overte des leyns & auteres marchandiſes appurtenant a l'eſtaple ſi bien al dit ville de Lenn' come aillours, paiant illoqes les cuſtomes & ſubſidies ent dues. A ſimilar petition from the ſame counties, with the addition of part of Suffolk, is alſo preſerved in the Rolls of Parliament[2].

In 1376-7, the inhabitants of the county of Leiceſter joined with thoſe of Northampton, Huntingdon, and Bedford, in repreſenting that the great ſtream of water between St. Ives[3] and Huntingdon was ſo ſtopped by three mills, that their veſſels with merchandize could not paſs, and many times were much injured to the amount of 200l. a year and upwards, and praying redreſs. The ſtatutes in that caſe provided were on this occaſion ordered to be enforced.

"A noſtre tres redoute Sr̄ le Roi & as honurables Sr̄s del parlement ſupplient les communes des countees de Leyceſtre, Northampton, Huntyndon, & Bedeford, q̃ come le haut file de l'eawe entre Seint Ives & Huntyngdon eſt eſtope par iii molyns, q̃ les bateux & niefs ne puiſſent par eux paſſer ove lour vitailles & merchandiſes; par quel eſtopage des dites molyns, l'eawe les blees & prees ſouthmergeont, c'eſt aſſavoir les vill' de Bukeden, Brampton, Gormceſtre, & Hemyford, & Huntyngdon, & pluſours autres qi demurront pres de l'eawe, as damages des communes, countees, & vill' avaunt ditz de ccli. par an, & pluis. De qi ils priont remedie eſtre ordene en ceſt plein parlement, pur Dieux, & en oevre de charitee.

By an act, paſſed in 1699, for making and keeping the river Trent, in the counties of Leiceſter, Derby, and Stafford, navigable; William lord Paget, lord of the manor of Burton upon Trent, &c. was to have full power for making the Trent navigable from Wilden ferry to Burton town, and cut banks, &c. and make ways, &c. and towing paths. Undertaker to have 3d. a ton for all goods, &c. carried on the river above Wilden ferry. Lord Paget, &c. may make bye laws, &c. and ſet fines, which ſhall be binding. Juſtices of aſſize may alter or reform the ſame. Maſter of barge or boat anſwerable for damage, &c. Commiſſioners to ſurvey the river and banks, &c. and make orders and decrees, &c. at the undertaker's charge. Lord Paget to ſet up gates, bridges, &c. River Trent to be for ever a navigable river from Gainſborough to Wilden ferry, &c. 600l. to be raiſed upon the inhabitants of Burton over and above the 600l. raiſed by the duties. William Paget Eſq. to act for his father during his abſence. River to take its antient current by Repton. No perſon to come upon the earl of Huntingdon's lands on the South ſide of the Trent, except Heys meadow[5].

The rivers which paſs through Leiceſterſhire (the Trent being only a boundary to it) though not large, are convenient and ornamental, and ſupply the county with many ſorts of fiſh, particularly the beſt ſort of ſalmon, which comes from the Trent into the Soar. This river, anciently called Leire, is the largeſt in the county. Riſing from two heads a mile or more diſtant aſunder, in the South-weſt part of it[6], it moves on with a ſlow and gentle courſe; and, having received the tribute of the little river Sence, near Wheſton, encompaſſes Leiceſter on the Weſt and North ſides; and, after receiving the Wreke near Coſſington, paſſes by Mountſorrel and Loughborough, dividing this county from Nottinghamſhire, till at Thrumpton, in that county, it diſembogues into the Trent.

In 1634, Thomas Skipwith, Eſq. obtained the following grant, to make the river Soar portable for boats and barges to the town of Leiceſter.

"CHARLES, &c. To all to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting. Whereas our well-beloved ſubject, Thomas Skipwith, gentleman, by his humble petition, hath ſhewn unto us that our county of Leiceſter, being a champion country, and deſtitute of ſuch ſupplies for fuel as are abundant in other places, is conſtrained to fetch their coals unto the moſt parts thereof at a diſtance of eighteen or twenty miles; and that the town of Leiceſter, which is the center of that county, hath a river diſchanneling itſelf into the great river of Trent, which, with ſome good coſt and charges, and without inconvenience to any, might be made fit for carrying of boats or veſſels; which would be of good uſe, and much eaſe and advantage to that county and other adjoining counties, as well for the furniſhing thereof with ſuch neceſſary commodities as they ſtand in need of, as for the ſupplying the wants of other adjoining counties with ſuch proviſions and commodities which they might well ſpare; which ſaid petition, and the ſuggeſtion and matters therein contained, we were pleaſed to refer to the conſideration of our right truſty and right well-beloved couſins Henry earl of Huntingdon and Henry earl of Staunford, who calling unto them ſome of the town of Leiceſter and others of the county, they might underſtand what could be alleged either for or againſt the ſaid deſign of the petitioner, that ſuch proceedings might be held therein as might conduce to the common good of that and other adjoining counties; whereupon the ſaid earls of Huntingdon and Staunford, having duly conſidered of the premiſes, and having called and had conference with ſome of the inhabitants of the town of Leiceſter, and others, concerning the ſame, did find them inclinable and willing to have the ſaid work effected; and did thereupon certify us that they conceived that the purpoſe of the ſaid petitioner, if it might be brought to paſs, would be of good conſequence both to the town and county of Leiceſter: We, therefore, being willing to promote and advance the good deſigns and endeavours of our loving ſubjects, and eſpecially ſuch as ſhall tend to a public good, and finding that the ſaid work is to be undertaken at the proper coſts and charges of the petitioner, and ſuch as ſhall voluntarily adjoin and aſſiſt him therein, and being graciouſly inclined, as well to favour and further the ſaid work as to provide for the petitioner, that he may receive a meet and juſt recompence for his labour, diſburſements, and expences, to be undergone therein; Know ye therefore, that we, for the reaſons and conſiderations aforeſaid, of our eſpecial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have given and granted, and for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, do give and grant, unto the ſame Thomas Skipwith, his heirs and aſſigns, full and free licence, power, privilege, and authority, by theſe preſents, that he the ſaid Thomas Skipwith, his heirs and aſſigns, at his and their proper coſts and charges, ſhall or may make the ſaid river of Soare portable for boats and other veſſels from the river of Trent to the town of Leiceſter aforeſaid; and, for that end and purpoſe, ſhall or may make, direct, and ſet up, ſuch and ſo many locks, engines, ſtructures, or devices, in the ſaid river of Soare, and on the banks thereof, as he or they ſhall think fit, and ſhall or may uſe, employ, or ſet on work, ſuch and ſo many artificers, workmen, and labourers, as he or they ſhall find meet, for the digging, cleanſing, ſcouring, and making the ſaid river portable and paſſable for boats and other veſſels, and bottoms of competent bulk and burthen, for the carrying and conveying of coals, fuel, and other commodities, as well from the ſaid river of Trent unto the town of Leiceſter, as from the ſaid town of Leiceſter to the ſaid river of Trent, as occaſion ſhall from time to time require; he the ſaid Thomas Skipwith, his heirs and aſſigns, firſt compounding and agreeing with the ſeveral lords, owners, or occupiers, of the ſaid river, or of any mill or mills thereupon being, or of any land or ſoil on either ſide of the ſame river, upon reaſonable recompence and ſatisfaction to be in that behalf made and given according to the loſs or damage they do or ſhall ſuſtain by the premiſes, &c. &c.[1]"

[6] One of theſe is at Sharnford. The other at Leiceſter Grange, about a quarter of a mile on the Warwickſhire ſide of the Watling-ſtreet road, which it croſſes; and entering Leiceſterſhire in the pariſh of Burbach, after it has run about four or five hundred yards, it for the firſt time takes the name of Soar-Brook, running at the bottom of Soar-Hill, on the top of which ſtood, about the year 1730, a windmill, known by the ſame name. There is alſo, ſomewhat lower, a large ſtone, which lies as a bridge over the brook, called Soar-ſtone, in the road from Smockington to Burbach; under which pariſh a farther account will given both of the original ſpring and of the Grange where it is ſituated.

By an act of parliament, in 1776, the river Soar was allowed to be made navigable from the river into which it empties itſelf, to Biſhop's meadow, within the liberty of Garenton; and a navigable cut was at the ſame time authorized to be made and maintained thence, near or up and into The Ruſhes, at Loughborough[2]. This plan being accompliſhed in 1778, a navigable canal was then opened at Loughborough, ſupplied by ſeveral neighbouring ſtreams, and communicating with the Soar; which now brings up coals from Derby, &c. at a very eaſy price.

The counties of Leiceſter and Northampton are bounded at one extremity by the Welland, which, going down by Stamford in Lincolnſhire, paſſes into the North-eaſt ſea; and at the other by the Avon, which, running into Severn near Tewkeſbury, falleth into the South-weſt ſea.

The courſe of this and ſome other of the rivers in Leiceſterſhire is thus deſcribed in an antient deed preſerved by Sir Thomas Cave from the MSS. of Mr. Bridges:

"Weland hath his head at Sibertoft, and ſo runneth betwene Leic' and North' by Thedynworth, Lubnam, Harborow, Thorplangton, and to Welham and Bringeaſt, wear it receiveth a riveret from Scevington, Tugbie, Godebie, Shankton, Turlangton, on the Weſt, and Stanton and Gloweſton on the Eaſt, and Cranow, and ſo into Weland, which paſſeth to Eaſton, and there receiveth another from Tilton, paſſing by Lodington, Caythorp, and Alexton, Stokeſton, Holt, Drayton, and ſo at Eaſton entereth into the Weland under Rokingham.

"At Gaulbie, between Norton and Burton, by Glen; between Wiſtow and Newton, by Kilby on the South, by Foſton and Counteſthorp on the South, between Wigſton and Blabie, to Weſton, into the Sore, between Enderbie and Elſton.

"Above Kyrbie, between Ratbie and Glenvill, by Grobie and Anſtie, on the North; by Newton, between Bradgate, Thurcaſton, Swythland, and Rodely, and ſo into the Sore.

"From Laune to Withcoke, by Oweſton and Knoſton on the Eaſt, Burrow on the Eaſt, to Twiford, to Aſhbie Folvil, Barcſby, and ſo meeteth it with the ryll that ryſeth between Loweſby and Newton, between Bagrave and Croxton, to Quenebro, and ſo both into the Wreake by Rereſbie.

"At Caudwell, Stoneſbie, Waltham, Thorpe-Eranld, Frabie, Wyverbie, where it taketh in two rills, the one from Saltbie, Sproxton, Coſon, Garthorp; the other having two heads, firſt from Edmondthorp to Wymondham to Saxbie, the other from Pickwell to Stapleford, meeting both between Breutynbie and Wyvrebie, into the Wreake; to Melton, between Syſonbie and Kirbie, between Friſby and Aſſorbie, between Thruſſington and Brokeſbie, and by Ratcliff entereth into the Sore.

"Two rills; one at Scalford, the other at Welbie.

"Dene; at Croxton, Braunſton, Knipton, by Harſton, through Lincolnſhire, to Boteſworth and Normanton.

"Smyte; at Holwell, Ketelbie, Nether Broughton, and Clauſton, Harbie, Stathern, Plunger.

"Sence. Bagworth park to Barleſton, between Carleton and Oſbaſton, and Boſworth to Twycroſs, between Welſboro and Shepey to" . . . . . . Cætera aeſunt.

Leland, in the reign of Henry VIII. ſays, "I rode by Rokingham, and after over Welande ryver, that departith there and much yn other places Northamptonſhire from Leiceſterſhire. The bridge ſelf of Rokingham departith as a limes Northampton, Leiceſterſhire, and Ruthelandſhire. I rode over a notable broke or two bytwixt Weland water and Stanton. The broke that cummith by Stanton riſith at . . . . . . In paſſing between Stanton and Leirceſter I rode over two or three brokes[3]." Again, "There is a ſtone bridge a quarter of a mile beyond Staunforde towarde Newſtede, and under it runneth a riveret caullid Waſche. This water riſith yn Leyrceſtreſhire, and cummith by Gritham in Rutheland-ſhire, and by Maſter Harington's place caulled . . . . . The hole courſe, from the hedde of it a litle byneth Waſch bridge, where it goith into Welande river a litle beneth Stauntdſord toune, is an XVIII or XX miles. The commune ſaying is there, that Waſche and Wiland ſhall drown al Holande. There cummith many ſmall rilles into this river of Waſche. Chater ryver cummith into Weland about a II miles above Stanford in ripâ ſuper. It riſith in Ruthelandſhir, or the egge of Leirceſterſhire, a XVI miles of by Weſt, and cummith within a mile of Uppingham, beying in Stanforde on the hither ripe, and thens VI miles to Okam a mile of on the farther ripe, and ſo to Ketton a V miles in reſpect being, in Stanford on the hither ripe: and there is a ſtone bridge over Chater of a VI arches of ſtone and half a mile lower in Toweland ryver[4]."

The Wrete, Wrekin, or Wreke, ſo called, probably, from the Saxon Ƿꞃeyꝺ, wreathing or winding like a mæander, riſes in the Eaſt part of the county, in the pariſh of Abkettelby; and, paſſing thence by Welby into the Eie, blends the name of that river in its own, and ſo glides on to Coſſington, where it falls into the Soar.

The Eie has three heads, two in Leiceſterſhire, and one in Rutland: the firſt (viz. that in Rutland) riſes at Langham, the ſecond at Somerby, the third at Saltby. The two firſt join at Whitſundine in Rutland; between Stapleford and Melton the third joins the other two. Below Eie-Kettelby, they all as one ſtream enter the Wreke, and we then hear no more of the river Eie.

The Devon is derived, it is ſuppoſed, from the Saxon ꝺaveı., furere, inſanire: well agreeing with the nature of ſuch a water as this is; ſoon up, ſoon down. It riſes at Eaton; whence it runs to Knipton (where it entertains the traveller with varieties of Aſteriæ); thence to Bottesford (where it again entertains the traveller with Aſteriæ); thence to Normanton meadows; whence it paſſes out of Leiceſterſhire into the county of Nottingham, and at length, after many windings, falls into the Trent above Newark. The fiſhery of the Devon appears very antiently to have been private property; for, in the year 1343, on an inquiſition taken after the death of William lord Ros, of Hamlak, it was found that he poſſeſſed the fiſhery of that river, which was worth an annual rent of twelve pence[1].

The Sence, as its name ſeemingly imports, ſignifies a briſk, live, quick ſtream. It riſes not far from Snibſton, and, a little below Atherſton in Warwickſhire, falls into the river Anker.

The Iriſh Snighbeach, creeping, ſeems to expreſs ſomething very agreeable to the nature of the Smyte; which, running through the Vale of Belvoir, and meeting with no hills or downfalls in its way, is ſeldom very rapid. It riſes at Holwell mouth, falls into the Devon at Shelton, and afterwards accompanies it into the Trent.

The Swift needs nothing but its name to expreſs its nature. It riſes at Knaptoft, and pours into the leſſer Avon above Rugby.

The Black-brook hath its riſe in Charnwood-foreſt, not far from Charley; and runs thence, through Garendon park, into the Soar by Loughborough. It is needleſs to ſay whence the name of this brook is derived; the colour of the water is occaſioned by a tincture of the ſoil.

Belle-meer is the ſame in French as bellum mare in Latin; and ſignifies a fine ſea, meer, ſheet, or piece of water. It riſes in the pariſh of Godeby-Maureward, where it forms ſeveral fine ponds, one of them above eight acres; thence it runs to Scalford, where it turns a mill; thence to Melton, where it turns another, and falls into the river Eie. The common people call it the Ballymore[2].

In 1782, a bill was carried into parliament, for making a navigable canal, from Chilvers Coton, at or near a place called Griff, through Buckington, Wolvey, and Burton Haſtings, in Warwickſhire; and through Burbach, Hinckley, Higham, Stoke-Golding, Dadlington, Sutton-Cheynell, Shenton, Market-Boſworth, Carlton, Congeſton, Shakerſton, and Snareſton, in Leiceſterſhire, and through Meaſham, and the lordſhips of Oakthorpe and Doniſthorpe, in Derbyſhire, to Woodlands Farm, on Aſhby Woulds[3], in Leiceſterſhire; to open an eaſy communication with the coal-mines at Meaſham, Oakthorpe, Aſhby Woulds, and the towns and villages adjacent, and alſo with the Oxford and Coventry canals[4]. This ſcheme, being oppoſed by a variety of intereſts, failed of ſucceſs.

In June, 1785, a plan which had been ſome time in agitation, for extending a navigable canal from Loughborough to Leiceſter, was taken into ſerious conſideration by the gentlemen of the county; and, after ſeveral ſucceſſive meetings, it was determined to apply to parliament for an act for that purpoſe. The buſineſs was reſumed in 1786; and in 1789 a bill was actually introduced into the Houſe of Commons, which was loſt on the ſecond reading.

July 16, 1790, at a public meeting of the county, to determine upon a general plan of navigation, Lord Rawdon, after ſtating the ſatisfaction which he felt in being able to meet the wiſhes of the publick in a matter ſo long and anxiouſly deſired, produced the outline of a plan, which was unanimouſly approved, for making the Soar navigable from Leiceſter to Loughborough; and a cut or rail-way from Swannington[5] and the neighbourhood to the baſon at Loughborough. At the ſame time it was agreed, that the navigation of the Wreke (if it ſhould be hereafter applied for) ſhould be ſupported with the influence of the promoters of the plan then propoſed.

An act of parliament was accordingly obtained, in 1791, for making and maintaining a navigable communication between the Loughborough canal and the town of Leiceſter; and for making and maintaining a communication, by railways, or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, from ſeveral places and mines, to the ſaid Loughborough canal; and for continuing the ſame by paſſing along the ſaid canal to the ſaid navigable communication; all in the county of Leiceſter.

The proprietors are by this act incorporated, under the name of "The Company of Proprietors of the Leiceſter Navigation;" and empowered, after the firſt Monday in July 1791, on which day the act was to take effect, to make and keep navigable and paſſable, for boats, barges, and other veſſels, the ſaid cut or canal, from or nearly from the baſon above the firſt locks on the North ſide of Loughborough, belonging to the company of proprietors of the navigation from the river Trent to Loughborough, through or near the ſeveral townſhips, pariſhes, or liberties, of Loughborough, Woodthorpe, and Quorndon, to and into the river Soar, in the pariſh of Quorndon, at the place marked in the map by the ſaid act directed to be authenticated; and to make and keep navigable and paſſable, for boats, barges, and other veſſels, the ſaid river Soar, with neceſſary cuts and deviations by the ſides thereof, thence to its junction with the river Wreak; and to make and keep navigable and paſſable, in like manner, the ſaid river Wreak, from ſuch junction, to near Turnwater meadow in the pariſh of Coſſington; and to make and keep navigable the ſaid cut or canal from or near the ſaid Turnwater meadow, through part of the ſaid Turnwater meadow, and through or near the ſeveral pariſhes, townſhips, or liberties, of Syſton, Barkby, and Thurmaſton, to and into the ſaid river Soar, in the townſhip of Thurmaſton; and to make and keep navigable and paſſable the ſaid river Soar, with neceſſary cuts and deviations by the ſides thereof, thence to or near Lady's-bridge in the pariſh of St. Margaret, and thence to or near Weſt-bridge in the pariſh of St. Mary, in or near to the town of Leiceſter; and alſo to make and maintain a rail or waggon-way, or ſtone-road, for the conveyance of coal, ſtone, lime, and goods, in carriages or vehicles to be conſtructed for that purpoſe, from or near Thringſton bridge, through or near the townſhips or liberties of Thringſton and Swannington, to the ſeveral coal-works of Wigſton's Hoſpital, under leaſe to Meſſieurs Raper and Fenton, in or near Swannington common, and other works now opened, or to be hereafter opened and worked, in the townſhip or liberty of Swannington and Swannington common; and alſo to make and maintain one other rail or waggon-way, or ſtone-road, with branches therefrom, for the conveyance of coal, ſtone, lime, &c. from the aforeſaid rail-way in the liberty of Thringſton, through or near the townſhips or liberties of Thringſton, Swannington, and Cole-Orton, to or near the ſeveral coal-works of Joſeph Boultbee, Eſq. in Thringſton common, and alſo to or near other coal-works of the ſaid Joſeph Boultbee, and of Godolphin William Burſlem, Eſq. reſpectively, in the pariſh or liberties of Cole Orton, and other works now opened, or to be hereafter opened and worked, in the pariſhes, townſhips, or liberties, of Thringſton, Thringſton common, and Cole-Orton aforeſaid, or any of them, as the ſame rail-ways are for the greater certainty delineated in the map; and to make and mantain a water-level for the furtherance of ſuch carriages, or vehicles, on proper floats or veſſels made to receive and conduct the ſame by water, from the commencement of the ſaid rail or waggon-ways at or near Thringſton bridge, through or near the ſeveral pariſhes, townſhips, or liberties, of Thringſton, Oſgathorpe, Gracedieu, Belton, Shepeſhed, and Beaumanor, to or near the South-Weſtward end of a certain lane leading into Charnwood foreſt, called the Loughborough or the Foreſt Lane; and to make and maintain another rail or waggon way, from the termination of the ſaid water-level, at or near the ſaid South-Weſtward end of the Foreſt lane, through or near the liberties of Beaumanor and the pariſh of Loughborough, to and into the baſon of the Loughborough canal, near the termination of the ſaid baſon by the town of Loughborough, for the effecting and finiſhing of the carriage of the ſaid coal, lime, and goods, on the ſaid carriages or vehicles, to the ſaid baſon; and alſo for the carriage of lime and goods from the ſeveral lime-works and other works opened or to be opened at Barrow-hill and Cloud-hill, both in the pariſh of Bredon, to the aforeſaid water-level; to make and maintain another water-level, to branch out from the aforeſaid water-level near to Thringſton-bridge, and to be continued through or near the ſeveral pariſhes, townſhips, or liberties, of Thringſton and Oſgathorpe, to or near a certain cloſe, in the pariſh of Oſgathorpe, in the occupation of Mary Moſeley; and to make and maintain another rail or waggon way, from the termination of the ſaid laſt mentioned water-level, at or near the ſaid laſt mentioned cloſe, through or near the ſeveral pariſhes, townſhips, or liberties, of Oſgathorpe and Bredon, to the ſaid ſeveral lime and other works now opened, or which may be hereafter opened, at Clouds-hill aforeſaid, with a branch of rail-way from or near the termination of the laſt mentioned water-level, through or near the townſhips or liberties of Oſgathorpe and Bredon, to the ſeveral lime-works now opened, or which may hereafter be opened, within the pariſh of Bredon aforeſaid; and alſo to make, complete, and maintain, other rail-ways, from the navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, already deſcribed, to the ſeveral coal-mines and limeſtone quarries lying near the courſe of the ſaid navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, or the terminations thereof, from time to time, as they ſhall think proper, ſo that no ſuch other or collateral rail-way or ſtone-road exceed the length of two thouſand yards; and to ſupply the ſaid navigation and water-levels, whilſt the ſame ſhall be making, and when made, with water from Swannington and Thringſton brooks, and alſo from ſuch ſprings as ſhall be found in making the ſame, and from ſuch brooks, ſtreams, and water-courſes, as are or ſhall be found within the diſtance of 2000 yards from any part of the ſaid intended navigation and water-levels, ſave and except as herein after is mentioned; and alſo to make a reſervoir upon Charnwood foreſt, at the place deſcribed upon the authenticated map, for the purpoſe of ſupplying the ſaid water-levels with water; and alſo to make ſuch and ſo many feeders and aqueducts as they ſhall think fit, for ſupplying the ſaid navigation, water-levels, and reſervoirs, with water; and, for the purpoſes aforeſaid, to cleanſe, ſcour, cut, dig, open, deepen, enlarge, or ſtraiten, any ſuch brooks, ſtreams, and water-courſes, or any others which may come or may be brought into, or made to communicate therewith reſpectively, and to dig, cut, or raiſe the banks of the rivers Soar and Wreak, and of any other the ſtreams, brooks, and water-courſes aforeſaid, for bringing water into the ſaid rivers, or either of them, or into the ſaid water-levels and reſervoirs, and to make ſuch proper trenches or paſſages for water, in, upon, or through, the lands or grounds adjoining or near unto the ſaid navigation, water-levels, and reſervoirs, or ſuch ſtreams, brooks, or water-courſes, aforeſaid, or any of them, as ſhall be neceſſary or proper for effectuating the act; and, for the ſeveral purpoſes aforeſaid, to enter into, upon, and through, the lands and grounds of or belonging to the king's majeſty, his heirs or ſucceſſors, or of any other perſon or perſons, bodies politic, or corporate, or collegiate, whatſoever, not being at this time ground whereon a dwelling houſe or out-houſes thereto belonging ſtand, or a yard, garden, orchard, park, paddock, planted walk or avenue to a houſe, lawn incloſed or adjoining to a manſion-houſe (except a garden in the lordſhip of Loughborough aforeſaid, containing one acre and a half or thereabouts, belonging to Ambroſe Newbury, now or late in the occupation of Joſeph Gutteridge; alſo except a garden in the lordſhip of Loughborough aforeſaid, containing eight perches or thereabouts, belonging to Thomas Haines, and in the occupation of Thomas Ainſworth; alſo except a cloſe, garden, or orchard, at Barrow upon Soar, in the ſaid county, planted with fruit-trees, and containing about one acre, now or late the property of George Perkins, and now or late in the occupation of Thomas James; alſo except a cloſe or orchard at Burſtall in the ſaid county, planted with fruit-trees, belonging to and in the occupation of Thomas White, and containing one acre and a half or thereabouts; and alſo except another cloſe or orchard at Burſtall aforeſaid, belonging to John Baſs Oliver, Eſq. and in the occupation of Gowen Scott, alſo containing about one acre and a half or thereabouts; alſo except the ground whereon three dwelling-houſes, in the ſtreet called the North-ſtreet, or North-gate-ſtreet, in Leiceſter aforeſaid, ſtand, and the three gardens thereunto reſpectively belonging, one thereof containing nine perches or thereabouts, belonging to James Nutt, and in the occupation of John Harris, another thereof containing ten perches or thereabouts, belonging to Joſeph Gilbert, and in the occupation of William Mebbiſon, and the other containing eleven perches or thereabouts, belonging to Thomas Raſk, and in the occupation of Robert Grice; and alſo except another garden adjoining or lying near the ſaid North ſtreet belonging to the Rev. John Simpſon and Robert Brewin, as truſtees of John Brewin, a minor, and in the occupation of Thomas Peach, containing two roods and a half, or thereabouts; and alſo except an orchard or piece of ground likewiſe lying near the ſaid North ſtreet, planted with trees, containing half an acre or thereabouts, belonging to the ſaid James Nutt, and now or late in the occupation of Thomas Rickards; and alſo except a houſe, with an orchard and garden thereunto adjoining, in the pariſh of Oſgathorpe, in the occupation of Moſes Young and his ſon, containing three roods or thereabouts; alſo except a ſmall garden or piece of ground, containing about one rood, in the lordſhip of Loughborough aforeſaid, now or late belonging to and in the occupation of Thomas Cooke; and alſo except two houſes in the pariſhes of Whitwick and Shepeſhead, or one of them, in the ſeveral tenures of William Wootton, Joſeph King, John Ball ſenior, and John Ball junior, and the gardens or orchards adjoining thereto; which ſaid ſeveral premiſes may be uſed and cut through for the purpoſes of this act); and to bore, dig, cut, trench, ſough, remove, take, carry away, and lay, earth, clay, ſtone, ſoil, rubbiſh, trees, roots of trees, beds of gravel or ſand, or any other matters and things (except as herein after is excepted) which may be dug or got in making of the ſaid navigation, rail-ways, or ſtone-roads, and water-levels or reſervoirs, or in making any feeders or aqueducts, or out of the lands and grounds of any other perſons adjoining or lying contiguous thereto, and which may be proper, requiſite, or convenient, for carrying on, continuing, maintaining, or repairing, or which may hinder, prevent, or obſtruct, the making, uſing, or completing, extending and maintaining, the ſame reſpectively; and for making, uſing, completing, extending, and maintaining, of ſuch trenches, paſſages, and water-courſes, as aforeſaid, as ſhall be neceſſary and proper to convey water to or from the ſaid navigation, water-levels, and reſervoirs, according to the tenor and purport of this act; and alſo to make, build, erect, and ſet up, in or upon the ſaid intended navigation, rail-ways, or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, or upon the lands adjoining or near the ſame reſpectively, ſuch and ſo many bridges, tunnels, aqueducts, ſluices, locks, flood-gates, weirs, pens for water, water-ſtanks, reſervoirs, drains, wharfs, quays, houſes, warehouſes, watch-houſes, landing-places, weighing-beams, cranes, dry-docks, and other works, roads, and conveniences, as and where they the ſaid company of proprietors, their ſucceſſors or aſſigns, ſhall think requiſite, and convenient for the purpoſes of the ſaid navigation, rail-ways or ſtone roads, and water-levels; and alſo from time to time to alter, repair, and amend, or diſcontinue the ſame, and to make, widen, and enlarge, or alter, any bridges, ways, roads, paſſages, cuts, locks, tunnels, aqueducts, trenches, ſluices, and other works and conveniences, as well for the carrying and conveying of goods, commodities, and other things, to and from the ſaid navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, reſpectively, as for the carrying and conveying of all manner of materials neceſſary for the making, erecting, finiſhing, altering, repairing, amending, widening, or enlarging, any works of or belonging to the ſaid navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels; and alſo to place, lay, work, or manufacture, any materials, on the grounds near to the place or places where the ſaid works, or any of them, ſhall or are intended to be made, erected, repaired, or done, and to build and conſtruct the ſeveral locks, bridges, works, and erections, belonging thereto; and alſo to make, maintain, repair, and alter, any fences or paſſages, over, under, or through, the ſaid intended navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, or the tunnels, aqueducts, ſoughs, trenches, paſſages, gutters, water-courſes, and ſluices, reſpectively, which ſhall communicate therewith; and alſo to make, ſet out, and appoint, ſuch towing-paths, banks, roads, and ways, convenient for towing, haling, or drawing of boats, barges, and other veſſels, paſſing in, through, or upon, the ſaid navigation and water-levels, with men, horſes, or otherwiſe, as they, the ſaid company of proprietors, their ſucceſſors or aſſigns, ſhall think convenient; and alſo to dig, take, and carry away, ſoil, clay, gravel, or ſtone, proper, requiſite, and convenient, for carrying on and continuing the ſaid works and undertakings, or any of them, in or from any grounds of any perſon or perſons adjoining or lying convenient thereto (not being, at the time of paſſing this act, a houſe, garden, yard, park, paddock, planted walk or avenue to a houſe, or lawn incloſed or adjoining to a manſion-houſe); and to conſtruct, erect, and keep in repair, any piers, arches, and other works, in, upon, and acroſs, any rivers or brooks, for the making, uſing, maintaining, and repairing, of the ſaid propoſed navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, and towing-paths, on the ſides of the ſaid navigation and water-levels; and alſo to conſtruct, erect, make, and do, all other matters and things, which they ſhall think convenient and neceſſary, for the making, effecting, extending, and preſerving, improving, completing, and uſing, the ſaid navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, in purſuance and within the true intent and meaning of this act, they, the ſaid company of proprietors, their ſucceſſors or aſſigns, and their ſeveral agents and workmen, doing as little damage as may be in the execution of the ſeveral powers to them hereby granted, and making ſatisfaction in manner herein after mentioned to the owners or proprietors of, or perſons intereſted in, the lands, tenements, mills, or hereditaments, waters, water-courſes, brooks, or rivers, reſpectively, which ſhall be taken, uſed, removed, diverted, or prejudiced, for all damages to be by them ſuſtained in or by the execution of all or any of the powers of this act; and this act ſhall be ſufficient to indemnify the ſaid company of proprietors, and their ſervants, agents, or workmen, and all other perſons whomſoever, for what they or any of them ſhall do by virtue of the powers hereby granted, ſubject, nevertheleſs, to the reſtrictions herein after mentioned. It ſhall in no caſe be lawful to divert, or take for the uſe or ſupply of the water-levels intended to be made by virtue of this act, or any of them, or for any other purpoſe whatſoever, any water from or out of a certain brook called Gracedieu Brook, or any of the ſprings, ſtreams, or water-courſes, by which the ſaid brook, called Gracedieu brook, is now ſupplied. Nothing ſhall extend to authorize the Company of Proprietors, &c. in making or ſupplying the ſaid water-levels, or either of them, or any reſervoir or reſervoirs for the purpoſe of feeding or ſupplying the ſame, or either of them, with water, or for any other purpoſe whatſoever, ſo to diminiſh the quantity of water flowing or paſſing down a certain other brook, called Black Brook, as at any time to reduce the quantity of water paſſing down the ſame below the average quantity paſſing down the ſame in common ſeaſons; but that the ſaid Company of Proprietors ſhall and will diſcharge, or cauſe to be diſcharged, from the ſaid water-levels, or one of them, or from ſome reſervoir or reſervoirs to be made for the purpoſe of feeding and ſupplying the ſame with water, into the courſe of the ſaid brook, called Black brook, at all times after the ſaid water-levels and reſervoir or reſervoirs ſhall be made as aforeſaid, and during the time of making the ſame, or any of them, ſo much and as large a quantity of water (ſuch quantity to be aſcertained in the manner herein directed) as now flows down the ſaid brook, called Black brook, in common ſeaſons, at the point where the ſaid brook will be croſſed or interſected by one of the ſaid water-levels, and in ſuch manner that the ſaid quantity of water may always flow under the ſaid water-level down the courſe of the ſaid brook. For the purpoſe of aſcertaining the average quantity of water flowing in ſuch common ſeaſons down the ſaid brook, called Black brook, and the quantity of water to be diſcharged at all times from the ſaid water-levels, or one of them, or from ſuch reſervoir or reſervoirs as aforeſaid, the quantity of water which ſhall paſs or flow down the ſaid brook, called Black brook, ſhall, at the coſts and charges of the ſaid Company of Proprietors, be meaſured, or otherwiſe aſcertained, by the engineer of the ſaid Company of Proprietors, or ſuch perſon as he ſhall appoint, and ſuch other engineer as the owner or owners of Garendon park, for the time being, or his, her, or their known agent, ſhall appoint, and at three different times, videlicet, within one calendar month next after the commencement of this act, and in the months of July and September then next following, on ſuch day on each of thoſe months, reſpectively, as may be fixed by ſuch engineer of the ſaid Company of Proprietors, or the perſon to be by him appointed as aforeſaid; who is hereby required to give five days notice at the leaſt to the owner or owners of Garendon park for the time being, or to his, her, or their known agent, or to the engineer ſo to be appointed by ſuch owner or owners, or his, her, or their agent as aforeſaid; and that the average quantity of water, ſo to be aſcertained, ſhall be deemed to be the average produce or quantity of water of the ſaid brook, called Black brook, in common ſeaſons; and that a certificate of ſuch average quantity of water, ſigned by ſuch engineer of the ſaid Company of Proprietors, or ſuch perſon to be by him appointed as aforeſaid, and the ſaid engineer to be appointed by the ſaid owner or owners of Garendon park for the time being, or other agent of ſuch owner or owners, ſhall be recorded at the firſt general quarter ſeſſions of the peace, to be holden for the ſaid county of Leiceſter, after ſuch average quantity of water ſhall be aſcertained as aforeſaid, and that a copy of ſuch record, ſigned by the clerk of the peace for the county of Leiceſter, ſhall be at all times hereafter proper evidence of the ſame; provided, that in caſe between the time of giving any ſuch notice as aforeſaid, and the day to be appointed or fixed as aforeſaid, for aſcertaining the average quantity of water flowing down the ſaid brook, called Black brook, in ſuch common ſeaſons, there ſhall happen to fall any quantity of rain to affect the ſaid brook, that then, and in every ſuch caſe, the ſaid engineer of the ſaid Company of Proprietors, or other perſon by him to be appointed as aforeſaid, ſhall not be bound to meaſure or aſcertain the ſaid quantity of water on the day ſo fixed by ſuch notice as aforeſaid, but may from time to time appoint another day in each of the ſaid months (giving the like notice thereof as before required) for the purpoſe of ſo aſcertaining the ſaid quantity of water, in order that an admeaſurement of the ſaid water may be avoided at or during the time of the fall, or during the effect, of any ſuch quantity of rain.

[1] Eſc. 17 Edw. III. 1343. N° 60. Leic.

[2] MS Peck.

[3] The Woulds are between Aſhby-de-la-Zouch and Warwickſhire; and are about 15 miles diſtant from the Soar.

[4] In the application to parliament, it was repreſented that the whole courſe of the intended canal lay open upon a dead level, ſo that there would not be occaſion for any lock to be made thereupon, unleſs it were one to regulate the water; and that the want of coal for fuel, and lime for the manure of land, was ſeverely felt by the inhabitants who reſided in and about ſeveral parts of the counties of Leiceſter, Warwick, Northampton, Buckingham, and Oxford; and that, by the making of ſuch canal, the conveyance of coal and lime, and goods of all deſcriptions, as well to the Coventry and Oxford canals, as to the neighbouring towns and villages, would be greatly facilitated.

[5] Swannington is a little Eaſt of Cole-Orton.

A waſte weir to carry off the overflowings of the ſaid water-levels, or ſome part thereof, ſhall be made, conſtructed, and at all times kept up, at or within ſuch diſtance from the point where the ſame is intended to croſs or interſect the ſaid brook, called Black brook, as that the water falling over and from the ſaid weir ſhall paſs and flow into and along the courſe of the ſaid brook; and no other waſte weir to be made or conſtructed on the water-levels, or either of them, ſhall at any time hereafter be formed, made, or kept lower than the ſaid weir, ſo to be made as aforeſaid.

It ſhall in no caſe be lawful for the ſaid Company of Proprietors, their agents, &c. to make or ſet up any warehouſes, watch-houſes, buildings, quays, wharfs, cranes, weigh-beams, or any other buildings or works whatſoever, upon any lands or grounds which are now the property of Hugo Meynell, the elder, eſq. and Hugo Meynell, the younger, eſq. or either of them, ſituate in Quorndon and Barrow upon Soar, in the ſaid county of Leiceſter, or either of them; or to dig, take, and carry away, any ſoil, clay, gravel, ſtone, or other materials, from any of the ſaid laſt-mentioned lands or grounds, without the licence or conſent of the owner or owners for the time being of ſuch laſt-mentioned lands or grounds.

Nothing in this act contained ſhall empower the ſaid Company of Proprietors, their ſucceſſors or aſſigns, to erect any wharf, quay, houſe, warehouſe, watch-houſe, landing-place, weighing-beam, crane, or dry dock, upon any part of the lands and grounds belonging to the rectory of Loughborough, without the conſent in writing of the rector for the time being, and of the maſter, fellows, and ſcholars, of Emanuel college, Cambridge, the patrons of the ſaid rectory, under their common ſeal; or to get or dig any earth, clay, ſtone, gravel, or ſoil, on ſuch lands (except what ſhall be gotten out of the direct line of the ſaid intended canal or navigation through the ſaid rectory lands during the time neceſſary for making and completing the ſaid navigation); or to lay any materials on ſuch lands (except as is herein before laſtly excepted) without ſuch conſent as aforeſaid.

For carrying the ſaid canal or navigation from the ſaid baſon belonging to the Loughborough canal company to the town of Leiceſter, at a convenient diſtance from Wanlip Hall, the dwelling houſe of Charles Grave Hudſon, eſq. the cut or canal (part of the ſaid navigation) to be made from the Wreak to the Soar, ſhall be made, kept, and maintained, through Turnwater meadow aforeſaid, and through certain other lands in the lordſhips or liberties of Syſton, Barkby, and Thurmaſton, according to the line or courſe marked in the authenticated map, to and into the ſaid river Soar, in the pariſh of Thurmaſton, at or near a cloſe there belonging to William Adcock, in the occupation of John Johnſon; and the ſaid cut or canal and navigation ſhall not be made in any place nearer to Wanlip Hall aforeſaid than 575 yards.

Whereas an act was paſſed in 1776 for making the river Soar navigable from the river Trent to Biſhop's meadow, within the liberty of Garendon, in the county of Leiceſter, and for making and maintaining a navigable cut or canal thence near or up and into the Ruſhes of Loughborough, in the ſaid county; and whereas it will be neceſſary, in order to make, complete, and uſe, the ſaid navigable and other communications, hereby authorized to be made, to paſs along and acroſs the ſaid Loughborough canal navigation; the ſaid Company of Proprietors, and their agents, &c. are by this act empowered, by all proper and neceſſary ways and means, to cut into the ſaid Loughborough canal navigation, at about the diſtance of 300 yards below the upper end or termination of the ſame, in order that boats, barges, and other veſſels, may navigate and paſs acroſs and along the ſame, from the ſaid intended navigation, to be made by virtue of this act, to the ſaid intended communication by rail-ways and water-levels, and from the ſaid rail-ways and water-levels, to the ſaid intended navigation, without being ſubject or liable to the payment of any rates or duties by the ſaid recited act authorized to be collected. The ſaid Company of Proprietors, their ſucceſſors and aſſigns, are authorized and required, at their own expence, to erect and build over the cut or canal, hereby authorized to be made, a proper and ſufficient draw-bridge, or ſwivel-bridge, where the towing-path belonging to the Loughborough canal navigation now goes, which will be cut through for the purpoſes of this act, fit and proper for men and horſes haling veſſels to paſs over; and from time to time, and at all times for ever hereafter, to keep and maintain the ſaid bridge in good and ſufficient repair, for the uſe and convenience of all perſons employed on or about the ſaid Loughborough canal navigation, and the towing-path thereto belonging.

And whereas it has been aſcertained and agreed, by and between the Company of Proprietors of the navigation of the river Trent to the town of Loughborough and the Company of Proprietors of the ſaid intended navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, that the ſaid Company of Proprietors of the navigation from the river Trent to the town of Loughborough now receive and enjoy from the ſaid navigation, from the river Trent to the town of Loughborough, certain rates and duties, amounting to the annual groſs ſum of 3000*l*; and whereas the ſaid navigation, rail-ways and ſtone-roads, and water-levels, intended to be made in purſuance of this act, may occaſion a diminution in the rates and duties payable to the ſaid Company of Proprietors of the navigation from the river Trent to Loughborough; and whereas the ſaid Company of Proprietors of the navigation from the river Trent to Loughborough, in conſideration of being indemnified againſt any loſs or diminution of their ſaid preſent groſs annual income, ariſing from the ſaid navigation from the river Trent to Loughborough, have agreed to grant to the Company of Proprietors of the ſaid intended navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels; the privilege of navigating boats, barges, and other veſſels, belonging to the ſaid Company of Proprietors of the ſaid intended navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, or to any other perſon or perſons whomſoever, along and acroſs the upper pond of the ſaid navigation from the river Trent to Loughborough, free from the payment of any tolls; in conſideration of which, and alſo of the ſaid Company of Proprietors of the navigation from the river Trent to Loughborough having agreed to reduce their preſent power of taking tolls, the ſaid Company of Proprietors of the intended navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, have agreed to make full compenſation to the ſaid Company of Proprietors of the navigation from the river Trent to the town of Loughborough, for any diminution which ſhall be occaſioned by the ſaid intended navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, in the ſaid preſent yearly groſs income ariſing from the ſaid navigation from the river Trent to the town of Loughborough.

And whereas there is a lane uſed as a road from the North ſtreet in Leiceſter to the North mill, the property of the mayor, bailiffs, and burgeſſes, of the borough of Leiceſter, and in the occupation of John Fiſher, which lane paſſes between two gardens belonging to the ſaid John Brewin, a minor; and whereas the ſaid navigation, and the towing path by the ſide thereof, is intended to be made through and along the ſouth ſide of the ſouthernmoſt of ſuch gardens; and if the ſaid towing-path was to be made ſufficiently wide for the purpoſe of a highway for the paſſage of horſes, cattle, and carriages, to the ſaid mill, it would be equally convenient for the uſe of the ſaid mill as the road at preſent uſed through the ſaid lane; and whereas the ſaid John Brewin, by his guardians, is willing and deſirous to give to the ſaid Company of Proprietors ſo much of the ground on the ſouth ſide of his ſaid ſouthernmoſt garden as will be ſufficient for the purpoſe of making their ſaid towing-path of a proper breadth for a highway as aforeſaid, without requiring them to fence off the ſame, in conſideration of his the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs, executors, adminiſtrators, and aſſigns, being permitted to uſe ſuch towing-path for all purpoſes he or they ſhall think proper (not prejudicing the ſaid intended navigation or obſtructing ſuch road), and of his the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs and aſſigns, being permitted to fence off the ſaid lane, at each end thereof, as far as the ſame divides his ſaid gardens, for the purpoſe of incloſing and laying the ſame to his ſaid gardens, and having the land ſo to be fenced inveſted in him the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs and aſſigns, which will not only be for the convenience of the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs and aſſigns, but alſo advantageous to the ſaid Company, and equally commodious for the uſe of the ſaid mill and the publick; the ſaid Company of Proprietors are authorized and required to make the ſaid towing-path, ſo far as the ſame extends through ſuch the aforeſaid garden of John Brewin, of ſuch breadth, not exceeding ſeven yards, as they ſhall judge expedient and neceſſary, and to make the ſame fit for the paſſage of horſes, cattle, and carriages, to the ſaid mill, without paying, or being liable to pay, any recompence or ſatisfaction for the ground ſo to be taken for that purpoſe, or being required to fence off the ſame; and, when and ſo ſoon as the ſaid new road ſhall be made as aforeſaid, the ſame ſhall be deemed to be a highway or road, in the room and ſtead of the ſaid preſent road, and ſhall be maintained and kept in repair in ſuch manner as the preſent is now, or ought to be, maintained and kept in repair; and, ſo ſoon as ſuch new road ſhall be made fit as aforeſaid, thenceforth the ſaid preſent road, ſo far as the ſame extends along the ſides of the ſaid gardens, ſhall ceaſe to be a highway or road for any purpoſe whatſoever, and thenceforth the whole of the ſaid lane, ſo to be incloſed and fenced in, ſhall be veſted in, and become, and for ever remain, the property and eſtate of the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs and aſſigns; and that it ſhall be lawful for the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs and aſſigns, to make ſuch fence acroſs the ſaid lane, at each end thereof, as before mentioned, and in ſuch ſuch manner as he or they ſhall think proper; and, to keep the part of the ſaid lane, ſo to be fenced in, thenceforth for ever incloſed as his and their entire property, without any claim from any perſon or perſons, on any account whatſoever; and that it ſhall alſo be lawful for the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs, executors, adminiſtrators, and aſſigns, to make ſuch fence againſt the towing-path, to be made as aforeſaid, as he or they ſhall think proper, or be at liberty to leave ſuch towing-path open to his or their own property, if he or they ſhall better approve of ſo doing; and that it ſhall alſo be lawful for the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs, executors, adminiſtrators, and aſſigns, without any recompence or ſatisfaction to be made to the ſaid Company of Proprietors, to uſe ſuch towing-path for all purpoſes he or they ſhall think proper, not prejudicing or obſtructing the ſaid intended navigation or ſuch road; and that no act ſhall be done by the ſaid Company of Proprietors, under or by virtue of this act, for the hindering or preventing the ſaid John Brewin, his heirs, executors, adminiſtrators, or aſſigns, from the free uſe and enjoyment of ſuch towing-path.—The mill, commonly called Wanlip-mill, ſtanding and near to Wanlip-hall aforeſaid, ſhall be taken down by the ſaid Charles Grave Hudſon; and, in compenſation and ſatisfaction for the ſame, the ſaid Charles Grave Hudſon ſhall be and be deemed a proprietor of ſuch ſhares or ſhares of and in the ſtock or fund of the ſaid Company of Proprietors as ſhall, at the time the ſame ſhall be divided into ſhares, be equal in value to the ſum of 500*l.* or as near thereto as may be.—In conſideration of the great charges and expences the ſaid Company will be at in making and maintaining the ſaid navigation, rail-ways or ſtone-roads, water levels, and all other the works hereby authorized to be made and erected, they are empowered from time to time to receive for their own proper uſe, for tonnage, ſtone, timber, and other goods, wares, and merchandiſes, and commodities whatſoever, which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon or through the ſaid navigation, rail ways or ſtone-roads, and water levels, ſuch rates and duties as the ſaid Company of Proprietors ſhall think fit, not exceeding the rates and duties herein-after mentioned; that is to ſay, for all coals which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon the ſaid navigation, from the Loughborough canal to Lady's bridge, or Weſt-bridge, the ſum of 1*s.* 2*d.* per ton; for all coals which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon any part of the ſaid navigation between the Loughborough canal and Lady's bridge, the ſum of 1*d.* per ton per mile, except coals which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, from the Loughborough canal to the junction of the river Wreak and the river Soar, and along the ſaid river Wreak, and paſſing upon the intended navigation to Melton Mowbray; and for all coals which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed upon the ſaid navigation from the ſaid Loughborough canal into and along the ſaid river Wreak, and paſſing upon the intended navigation to Melton Mowbray, 7*d.* per ton; for all iron, timber, and other goods, wares, and merchandiſes (except as herein-after is excepted), which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon the ſaid navigation from the ſaid Loughborough canal to Lady's bridge of Weſt bridge, 2*s.* 6*d.* per ton; for all iron, timber, and other goods, wares, and merchandiſes, (except as herein-after is excepted), which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon any part of the ſaid navigation, between the ſaid Loughborough canal and Lady's bridge, the ſum of 2*d.* per mile per ton; for all iron, timber, and other goods, wares, and merchandiſes (except as herein-after is excepted), which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon the ſaid navigation, from the ſaid Loughborough canal, into the ſaid river Wreak, and paſſing upon the ſaid intended navigation to Melton Mowbray, 1*s.* 3*d.* per ton; for all lime, lime-ſtone, and ſtones to be uſed for building, and materials for paving or repairing of roads, one half of the ſaid rates, tolls, and duties, herein-before authorized to be taken on coals; for all coals which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon any part of the ſaid rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, between the ſaid collieries and lime-works, at or near Swannington, Coal-Orton, Thringſton, Bredon, and Gracedieu, and the Loughborough canal, 1½*d* per ton per mile; for all lime and lime-ſtone which ſhall be carried or conveyed upon any part of the ſaid rail-ways or ſtone-roads, the ſum of 1½*d.* per ton per mile; for all lime and lime-ſtone which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon the ſaid water-levels, ¾*d.* per ton per mile; for all other goods, wares, and merchandiſes, which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed, upon any part of the ſaid rail-ways or ſtone-roads, and water-levels, 2*d.* per ton per mile. Provided that in all caſes where there ſhall be a fraction of a ton in the weight of lading of any ſuch boat, barge, or other veſſel, waggon, or other carriage, a proportion of the ſaid rates ſhall be demanded and taken by the ſaid Company of Proprietors hereby incorporated, according to the number of quarters of a ton contained therein, and in all caſes, where there ſhall be a fraction of a quarter of a ton in any ſuch weight, ſuch fraction ſhall be deemed a whole quarter of a ton.

In the ſame year, 1791, another act was obtained, "for making navigable the rivers Wreak and Eye, from the junction of the ſaid river Wreak with the intended navigation from Loughborough to Leiceſter, at or near a certain place called Turnwater meadow, in the lordſhip of Coſſington, to Mill Cloſe Homeſtead, in the pariſh of Melton Mowbray, all in the county of Leiceſter;" which, after ſtating, "that a communication by water between the river Trent and the town of Melton Mowbray would be productive of great public advantage, as well as particular local benefit to the ſaid town and neighbourhood, by rendering the carriage of coal, ſtone, lime, lime-ſtone, timber, lead, and all kinds of merchandiſe, to the ſaid town and neighbourhood, and to ſeveral parts of the counties of Leiceſter, Lincoln, and Rutland, much cheaper and eaſier than it is at preſent;" and alluding to the act which we have juſt epitomiſed; proceeds to ſtate, that it appears, by proper ſurveys, that the river Wreak may be made navigable for boats and other veſſels of heavy burden, by means of widening, deepening, and cleanſing, the ſame, and making neceſſary cuts and deviations by the ſides thereof, from its junction with the intended navigation from Loughborough to Leiceſter, at Turnwater meadow, within the lordſhip of Coſſington, to the river Eye; and that the river Eye may be made navigable, from its junction with the Wreak, to a place called Mill Cloſe Homeſtead, in the pariſh of Melton Mowbray; and that the ſeveral perſons therein named were deſirous of performing the ſame at their own expence. It was therefore enacted, that John duke of Rutland, Henry duke of Newcaſtle, Robert earl of Harborough, Robert earl Ferrers, the lord Middleton, the lord viſcount Melbourne, and divers other perſons, ſhould be incorporated for that purpoſe, under the name of "The Company of Proprietors of the Navigation from the Leiceſter Navigation to Melton Mowbray, in the County of Leiceſter;" and to have a common ſeal, with power to purchaſe lands; to make the navigation, and new trenches; to ſet out towing-paths, which are to be confined to the tops of the banks, and to be properly ſecured. The proprietors are reſtrained from erecting any mill, houſe, or other building, except warehouſes, boat-houſes, or watch-houſes, on the towing-paths, wharfs, or quays; and from planting trees on the lands ſet out for thoſe purpoſes; and are not to build any warehouſes, &c. within 300 yards of any capital manſion-houſe, or in or upon any garden, park, paddock, planted walk or avenue to a houſe, or lawn incloſed, adjoining to any capital manſion-houſe, that are uſed as ſuch at the time of this act's commencement. They are not to take down or damage any dwelling-houſe, or out-houſe, without the conſent of the proprietor; nor to cut down any timber-wood, bruſh-wood, or underwood, except on ſuch ground as may be ſet out for the purpoſes of the navigation. Nor are they to divert the courſe of, or to draw any water from, a rivulet which is fed by divers ſprings at ſome diſtance from the country, and runs through a back-water, called Scalford Dyke, into the river Eye, juſt above a water griſt mill, called The Two-Eye Mill, in the pariſh of Melton, belonging to Philip Burton, eſq. and held by leaſe under the ſee of Ely; which rivulet is a conſtant feeder to the mill, and principally in ſummer-time, when the river Eye is very low. Nor are any buildings to be erected on the lands of Peniſton lord Melbourne, called The Play Cloſe, and Cauſey-Hill Cloſe; nor any wharfs, &c. on the lands of William Reeve, eſq. in Melton aforeſaid, called The Bridge Leys, The Ormond's Piece, and that part of The Prior's Cloſe which lies Weſt of the Play Cloſe.

The act then proceeds to ſtate that ſurveys and levels had been taken; and directs the navigation to be made purſuant to an authenticated map or plan, and that the preſent line on the plan ſhall be purſued on the line of deviation from Mr. Reeve's manſion-houſe. Land-owners omitted in the book of reference are not to obſtruct the navigation; but lands may be entered upon for making ſurveys. Then follow many of the uſual proviſions, to the ſame purport as in the preceding act.

Commiſſioners are named for ſettling differences, and power given for providing a ſucceſſion of commiſſioners.

The ſum 25,000*l.* is allowed to be raiſed, and 5000*l.* more if wanted; the ſubſcription to be divided into 250 ſhares, each conſtituting a proprietor.

The tolls to be taken are, for all coals conveyed from the Leiceſter navigation to Eye-kettleby, Siſonby, or Melton, 2*s.* 6*d.* per ton; and for any ſhorter diſtance, 2½*d.* per mile. For all iron, timber, and other goods (with exceptions for dung, ſoil, marl, aſhes, and all manure but lime, and for materials for roads, provided they do not paſs through any lock, but are carried at times when the water ſhall flow over the gauge paddle or waſte weir of ſuch lock), carried from the Leiceſter navigation to Eye-kettleby, Siſonby, or Melton, 4*s.* per ton; or 4*d.* per mile for a ſhorter diſtance. For all lime, limeſtone, ſtones for building, and materials for roads, one half of the duty payable on coals; the fraction of a mile to be taken as a whole mile, and fractions of a ton to be reckoned as quarters.

Land-owners may uſe pleaſure-boats not carrying merchandiſe, and not paſſing through any lock, without paying any toll. Where fords are ſpoiled, the proprietors are to provide modes of paſſage; and they are empowered to regulate the mills and fiſheries, and to make drains. Lords of manors &c. may build wharfs on their own lands. The price of wharfage is fixed by the act. For coals, 2*d.* per ton; and nothing for any goods unleſs they remain on the wharf more than ſix hours; after which time, 1½*d* for every ton of ſlate, ſtones, timber, lime, or manure; and 4*d.* for any goods that may require being placed under cover. If they remain more than ſix days, 4*d.* per ton to be paid each day for open goods, and 2*d.* a day for thoſe under cover.

If the Leiceſter Company are called on to make up any deficiency in the income of the Loughborough Company, in purſuance of the Leiceſter act; this Company are in that caſe to reimburſe one ſixth part of the ſum they pay.

In 1792, a bill was brought into parliament, "for making a navigable canal from Grantham, in the county of Lincoln, to the river Trent, at or near Ratcliffe, in the county of Nottingham; which was intended to have been carried through Muſton, Botteſford, Redmile, Barkſton, Plungar, Stathern, Harby, Hoſe, Long Claxton, and Nether Broughton." This bill not having been prepared ſo as to anſwer all the purpoſes for which it was intended, it was, by permiſſion of the houſe of commons, withdrawn on the 20th of April, and a new bill preſented on the 23d, which, being ſtrongly oppoſed, did not get through the houſe.

In one of the petitions againſt this bill, it was ſtated by the inhabitants of Newark, that it was propoſed to make and raiſe a dam or weir acroſs a certain ſtream, or common river, called The Devon, and to intercept the water thereof, for the purpoſe of filling a reſervoir to ſupply the ſaid canal; and that the ſaid river Devon riſes in the pariſh of Harſton, in the county of Leiceſter, and, paſſing through the moſt fertile part of the county of Nottingham, empties itſelf into a branch of the river Trent, which flows by the town of Newark, and has of late been made navigable, at a very conſiderable expence, for the benefit of the ſaid town, which, being a place of great population and extenſive commerce, has ſeveral mills (particularly a very large and expenſive cotton-mill) ſituate on the ſaid branch of the river Trent, which ſeveral mills, as well as the navigation by the ſaid town of Newark, would, at leaſt, be materially injured, if not wholly deſtroyed, by ſuch propoſed diviſion of the water of the ſaid river Devon."

The petition of Anne and Emma Charlton, ladies of the manors of Staunton, Flawborough, and Alverton, ſtated, "that they were ſeiſed in fee of their capital manſion-houſe at Staunton, on the ſide of the river Devon, and of certain gardens and pleaſure-grounds adjoining, and of an antient and accuſtomed mill on the ſaid river, which had been in their poſſeſſion, or in the poſſeſſion of their anceſtors, ever ſince the time of Edward the Confeſſor; and that they were entirely ſupplied with water from, and had a right of fiſhery in, the river Devon, and were much intereſted in preſerving the waters of the ſaid river, as a fence to their ſeveral incloſures, for watering their cattle, and divers other purpoſes."

And another, from Mr. William Sanday, of Holme Pierrepont, ſtated, "that, ſhould the bill paſs into a law, he ſhould be deprived of the benefit of a wharf at Ratcliffe upon Trent, which, with warehouſes, ſheds, and other conveniences, for the purpoſe of landing and depoſiting coal, and houſing coke and other articles, for the ſupply of the vale of Belvoir, and for depoſiting corn, wool, and other articles, intended to go up or down the river Trent; and that the ſaid wharf and warehouſes, and other conveniencies, had been conſtructed at a very great expence.

The preſent year 1793 has been memorable for the various plans ſuggeſted for the extenſion of navigable canals throughout the kingdom: and in this line the counties of Leiceſter and Nottingham took ſo diſtinguiſhed a part, that an alarm took place among the land-owners, the graziers, and farmers; who preſented a petition to parliament, February 25, ſtating, " that they were conſiderable occupiers of lands, a great part of which being uſed in agriculture, much pains and induſtry were neceſſary, and great labour required, for managing the ſame, and in reaping and getting in the produce thereof; and that they had ſuſtained very great and heavy injuries in the preceding harveſt, by reaſon of the great ſcarcity of harveſt-men, owing principally to the great number of labourers employed in making and cutting navigations; and that they obſerved, with much alarm, the many petitions already preſented for bringing in bills, that preſent ſeſſion, for making numerous other canals; and that if the ſame, or any conſiderable part of them, ſhould meet with the approbation of parliament, it would not only tend to make labourers in huſbandry ſtill more ſcarce, but would render it impoſſible for the petitioners to reap and get in their crops of grain, unleſs the proprietors of ſuch navigations were reſtrained from working and carrying on the ſame during the time of harveſt; and ſubmitting to the houſe, that a clauſe, or clauſes, ſhould be inſerted in every bill for making any cut or canal then before the houſe, prohibiting the proprietors and undertakers from employing any labourers, in the making or cutting of any ſuch cut or canal, from the 1ſt day of Auguſt to the 1ſt day of October, in each year, during the making or cutting of ſuch cuts or canals."

The navigations, which occaſioned this application, and in which this county was more particularly intereſted, were theſe.

A petition was preſented, on the 28th of January, for a canal from Leiceſter to Northampton; and another, on the 18th of February, for a canal from Melton to Oakham; both which ſhall be hereafter fully noticed.

On the 18th of February, an application was again made for a canal from Grantham, to communicate with the Trent at Nottingham Bridge; and a bill was accordingly prepared, but, like the former one, was unſucceſsful. It paſſed through the houſe of commons on the 8th of April; but was loſt in the houſe of peers.

On the 18th of February, a petition was alſo preſented to the Houſe, ſigned by George Harry earl of Stamford, Thomas lord viſcount Wentworth, Charles lord viſcount Maynard, and many others, ſtating, " that it appeared, by levels and ſurveys lately taken, that a canal, for the navigation of boats, barges, and other veſſels, might be made from Aſhby de la Zouch in the county of Leiceſter, into, or through, the pariſhes or townſhips of Aſhby de la Zouch aforeſaid, Blackfordby and Boothorpe, in the county of Leiceſter, Doniſthorpe, in the counties of Leiceſter and Derby, Okethorpe and Meaſham, in the county of Derby, Snareſton, Shakerſton, Congeſton, Carlton, Market Boſworth, Coton, Shenton, Sutton Cheney, Dadlington, Stoke Golding, Higham, Hinckley, and Sketchley, in the county of Leiceſter, Stretton Baſkerville, Burton Haſtings, Wolvey, Bulkington, Marſton Jabet, and Chilvers Coton, in the county of Warwick, into the Coventry canal navigation, at or near Griff, in the ſaid pariſh or townſhip of Chilvers Coton; and alſo that cuts or branches might be extended therefrom, for the navigation of boats, barges, or other veſſels, from Aſhby de la Zouch aforeſaid, in, to, or through, the pariſhes or townſhips of Aſhby de la Zouch; Repton, and Ticknall, in the county of Derby; Staunton Harold, Coleorton, Worthington, Newbold, Thringſton, and Bredon, in the county of Leiceſter; to the lime works, lead mines, and coal mines, at Staunton Harold, lime works at Cloudhill, and coal mines at Coleorton, in the county of Leiceſter, whereby the inhabitants of the ſaid pariſhes or townſhips, and of the adjacent towns and places, would be ſupplied with coals, lime, and other merchandiſe, at a much lower price than they then were; and, by the communication which would be thereby opened with the Oxford and Coventry canals, great advantages would not only ariſe to the counties of Leiceſter, Derby, and Warwick, but alſo to the counties of Northampton, Buckingham, and Oxford."

The applications to parliament for and againſt this bill were uncommonly numerous; but the moſt formidable oppoſition to it was made by Penn Aſsheton Curzon, eſq. one of the members for the county; who ſtated, " that he was owner of a manſion-houſe, in the pariſh of Gopſall, in the county of Leiceſter, called Gopſall Hall, which, together with the improvements belonging thereto, had coſt upwards of 100,000 l. and of a ſpring iſſuing from a rock near the ſame, from which he was ſupplied with water for his houſe, and for the various uſes of his family; and that it appeared that the intended canal was propoſed to be made between his manſion-houſe and the ſaid ſpring, at the diſtance of about three quarters of a mile from the manſion-houſe, and 140 yards from the ſaid ſpring; and, in caſe the ſaid canal were made in the line propoſed, it would, in the opinion of experienced miners and engineers, totally deſtroy the ſaid invaluable ſpring, and in that caſe render the ſeat of the petitioner not fit for his reſidence in future."

Theſe arguments, and the concurrent oppoſition of ſome other gentlemen, had their weight; and, on the 29th of April, the bill was loſt for the preſent year; but will probably be revived in the enſuing ſeſſion.

In the act for making a navigation from Leiceſter to the river Nen, near Northampton, which received the royal aſſent April 30, 1793, it is ſtated, that the making and maintaining the river Soar navigable for boats, barges, and other veſſels, from the Leiceſter navigation, then making at or near the Weſt bridge, in the pariſh of St. Mary, in or near Leiceſter, to Aileſton bridge, and thence through or near the town of Northampton, into and along the river Nen, otherwiſe called The Northern River, to communicate with a branch of the intended canal at Hardingſtone from the Oxford canal at Braunſton in Northamptonſhire, to join the Thames at New Brentford; and the making a collateral cut from the before-mentioned canal, in or near the pariſh of Lubbenham, to or near Market Harborough, would open an eaſy and cheap communication between Market Harborough and Northampton, and the ſeveral townſhips, &c. through or near which the ſaid navigation and canal would paſs; and alſo between ſome of thoſe towns and places and the town of Leiceſter, and the ſeveral coal and lime works, and limeſtone-quarries, in the county of Leiceſter, and the county of Derby, and alſo between the ſeveral towns and places aforeſaid, and many ports, cities, and large populous towns; whereby the conveyance of coals, timber, ſtone, lime, limeſtone, lead, iron, corn, manure, and goods, wares, and merchandiſes, to and from thoſe places, would be greatly facilitated, and rendered leſs expenſive; and would be of great advantage to the trades and manufactures carried on in, between, and near, the above ports, cities, towns, and places, and tend to the improvement of the adjacent lands, the preſervation of the public roads, and be of great public utility. Iſabella dutcheſs of Rutland, Henry duke of Beaufort, Robert earl Ferrers, Francis lord Rawdon, Peniſton lord viſcount Melbourne, ſir Juſtinian Iſham, bart. ſir Charles Grave Hudſon, bart. and many others, incorporated by the name of " The Company of Proprietors of the Leiceſterſhire and Northamptonſhire Union Canal," are authorized to make, complete, and maintain, the ſaid river Soar navigable for boats, barges, and other veſſels, with proper cuts and deviations by the ſides thereof, from, and to communicate with, the Leiceſter navigation now making, at the termination thereof, at or near the Weſt bridge, in the pariſh of St. Mary, in Leiceſter, through the ſaid pariſh of St. Mary, and through part of the pariſh of Braunſton, in the county of Leiceſter, and of the pariſh of Aileſton aforeſaid, to or near to the ſaid bridge called Aileſton bridge; and thence to make, complete, and maintain, a canal navigable for boats, barges, and other veſſels, from or near the ſaid bridge called Aileſton bridge, through the ſeveral pariſhes, townſhips, hamlets, or places, of Aileſton aforeſaid, and of Little Glen, Wigſton Magna, Newton Harcourt, Glen Magna, Burton Overy, Kibworth Harcourt, Kibworth Beauchamp, Fleckney, Sadington, Smeton, Smeton-Weſterby, Gumley, Foxton, Lubbenham, and Thedingworth, all in the county of Leiceſter, and of Hothorpe, Marſton Truſſel, Clipſton, Eaſt Farndon, Oxenden Parva, Oxenden Magna, Kilmarſh, Maidwell, Lamport, Hanging Houghton, Botteſbrooke, Creaton, Spratton, Chapel Brampton, Church Brampton, and Dallington, and Hardingſtone, all in the county of Northampton, there to communicate with the river Nen, otherwiſe called the Northern river, and to proceed along the river, by means of widening, deepening, and cleanſing the ſame, to a point in the pariſh of St. Peter, in or near to the town of Northampton; and thence to make, complete, and maintain, a canal navigable for boats, barges, and other veſſels, through the ſaid pariſh of St. Peter, and the pariſhes of Duſton and Hardingſtone, both in the county of Northampton, to and into another part of the ſaid river Nen, and there to croſs the ſaid river Nen, to join and communicate with the intended branch of the canal from the Oxford canal navigation at Braunſton, to join the river Thames at New Brentford; and to make, complete, and maintain, a collateral cut or canal navigable for boats, barges, or other veſſels, from the before-mentioned canal, in the pariſh of Lubbenham aforeſaid, into and through the ſeveral pariſhes, hamlets, townſhips, or places, of Lubbenham aforeſaid and Great Bowden, both in the county of Leiceſter, to or near to the town of Market Harborough; and to ſupply the ſaid intended navigation, canal, and collateral cut, whilſt making, and at all times for ever after the ſame ſhall be made, with water from the river Soar, and from all rivers, brooks, ſprings, ſtreams, rivulets, and watercourſes, which ſhall be found in digging or making the ſaid navigation, canal, or collateral cut, or any of them, or within the diſtance of two miles from the head level of the ſaid intended canal and collateral cut, or within the diſtance of one mile from any other part of the ſaid navigation, canal, or collateral cut, or any of them, or from any other reſervoir or reſervoirs to be made by virtue of this act; and to make proper reſervoirs, ſoughs, tunnels, feeders, &c.; to cleanſe and enlarge ſuch ſtreams as come, or may be brought to communicate therewith; to dig, cut, or raiſe the banks of the Soar, or any other communicating ſtream; and to exerciſe all other the powers that are uſual in acts of this nature, ſubject to a few exceptions; of which the moſt material are, that no reſervoir ſhall be made but in the places deſcribed in the plan; that the canal ſhall be made as near as may be, to the rivulet dividing the pariſhes of Maidwell and Draighton, and as far as poſſible from Mr. Hungerford's manſion of Maidwell Hall; that it ſhall not come within 440 yards of Mr. Hanbury's manſion at Kelmarſh; that, in paſſing through the lands of Mary Major, widow, in Little Glen, it ſhall be carried as near as conveniently may be to the ſource along Cullam Lane, at the bottom of the cloſes called Glen Hills and Flaxleys, and at the lower part of Long Cloſe, Round Cloſe, and Kirkdale, without cutting into Long Meadow; and no warehouſe, &c. to be built upon Mrs. Major's eſtate. No water to be taken from any of the brooks on the eſtate of Sarah counteſs of Denbigh; no towing-path to be made on the ſide of the navigation near her manſion of Wiſtow Hall, nor any wharf, &c. within ſight of that manſion, or any of its gardens or pleaſure-grounds. No water to be taken from Kelmarſh brook to the prejudice of Mr. Hanbury's eſtate; nor any from the brooks of Thomas Pares, eſq. in the liberties of Great or Little Oxenden. The water of the cotton-mills to be preſerved, and the owners not to be any way prejudiced. The proprietors have liberty either to purchaſe St. Mary's Mill, the property of Rogers Ruding, eſq. or to make a good waggon-bridge, at the choice of Mr. Ruding. Aileſton mill not to be diſturbed without the free conſent of the owners.

The company are authorized to raiſe 200,000*l.* to be divided into 2,000 ſhares; and 100,000*l.* more, if neceſſary.

The tolls to be taken by this act are,

For all coal and coke, to be navigated and conveyed upon the ſaid navigation, canal, or collateral cut, the ſum of 2½*d.* per ton per mile; ſo that, to whatever extent the ſame ſhall be carried or conveyed, the amount of ſuch tonnage in the groſs ſhall not exceed 5*s.* per ton.

For all lime, dung, and manure, and limeſtone, the ſum of 1¼*d.* per ton per mile; ſo that, to whatever extent the ſame ſhall be carried or conveyed, the amount of ſuch tonnage in the groſs ſhall not exceed the ſum of 2*s.* 6*d.* per ton.

For all cattle, ſheep, ſwine, and other beaſts, and all ſtones, and all bricks, tiles, ſlates, and ſand, and all iron, ſtone, pig-iron, and pig-lead, the ſum of 2*d.* per ton per mile.

For all other goods, wares, merchandiſes, and things whatſoever, the ſum of 3*d.* per ton per mile.

Officers and ſoldiers on their march, their horſes and baggage, and timber for the royal navy, are exempted from toll; and, in certain ſpecified caſes, materials for roads, and ſeveral ſpecies of manure.

The towing-paths through the eſtates of Lady Denbigh and Mrs. Major are particularly directed to be fenced, and proper bridges to be made; and three bridges at leaſt on the eſtate of Mr. Pares at Great and Little Oxenden. Robert earl of Harborough, who, as lord of the manors of Market Harborough and Great Bowden, or one of them, is entitled to certain tolls and ſtall-rents to the annual value of 100*l.* and of a weighing machine worth 20*l.* a year, is to have that ſum made up to him out of the rates to be taken by this act; and proviſion is made that the rector of Church Langton (whoſe annual income of 600*l.* was, by the act of incloſure in 1781, to be regulated by a corn-rate) ſhall not be prejudiced by the operations of this act; but his loſs, if any, to be re-paid out of the tolls. Proviſion is alſo made for a future communication with a canal in contemplation from Uppingham, whenever an act of parliament ſhall be obtained for that purpoſe; and for ſuch other communications as the majority of proprietors may hereafter think proper to adopt under the ſanction of parliament. All the other clauſes in this act are ſuch only as are cuſtomary in other acts for ſimilar purpoſes.

In the act for making and maintaining a navigable cut or canal from the Melton Mowbray navigation, in the county of Leiceſter, to Oakham, in the county of Rutland, which received the royal aſſent on the 7th of May, 1793, it is ſtated, that a communication by water, between the river Trent and the town of Oakham, would be productive of great public advantage, and a particular local benefit to that town and neighbourhood, and to ſeveral parts of the country through which the ſaid communication is intended to be made, by rendering the carriage of coal, lime, limeſtone, lead, and all kinds of merchandiſe, to the ſaid town and neighbourhood, and to ſeveral parts of the counties of Rutland and Leiceſter, much cheaper and eaſier than it is at preſent; and that, by virtue of ſeveral acts of parliament, a navigable communication had been undertaken, and was then nearly perfected, between the river Trent and the town of Melton Mowbray, by the rivers Soar, Wreak, and Eye; and that, by ſurveys lately taken, it appears that a navigable cut, or canal, for boats and other veſſels of heavy burthen, may be extended and made from the ſaid navigation, at or near Melton Mowbray, into a place called Cutt's Cloſe, in the pariſh of Oakham. By this act, Iſabella dutcheſs of Rutland, Henry duke of Beaufort, George earl of Winchelſea and Nottingham, Henry earl of Gainſborough, Robert earl of Harborough, Peniſton lord viſcount Melbourne, the honourable Peniſton Lambe, ſir Gilbert Heathcote, baronet, and many others, incorporated under the name of "The Company of Proprietors of the Oakham Canal," are authorized to make and complete a canal, navigable and paſſable for boats, barges, and other veſſels, out of and from a place called Mill Cloſe Homeſtead, in the pariſh of Melton Mowbray, through the ſeveral pariſhes, hamlets, and places, of Melton Mowbray, Thorpe Arnold, Burton Lazars, Brentingby, Wyverby, Freby, Saxby, Wymondham, and Edmondthorpe, in the county of Leiceſter, and through the ſeveral pariſhes, hamlets, and places, of Teigh, Market Overton, Barrow, Cotteſmore, Burley, Langham, and Barlythorpe, to the ſaid place called Cutt's Cloſe, in the pariſh of Oakham; and to ſupply the ſaid canal, whilſt the ſame ſhall be making, and when made, with water from all ſuch ſprings as ſhall be found in making the ſaid canal, and alſo from all ſuch rivers, brooks, ſtreams, watercourſes, and ſprings, as are or ſhall be found within the diſtance of 1000 yards from any part of the ſaid purpoſed canal, or from the reſervoir intended to be made, and alſo to make ſuch reſervoir as ſhall be neceſſary for the purpoſes of the ſaid canal, for the more conveniently ſupplying the ſaid canal with water, and alſo ſuch and ſo many feeders and aqueducts as they ſhall think fit for ſupplying the ſaid canal and reſervoir with water. They are alſo empowered to build bridges, make towing-paths; to dig for gravel and materials; under the accuſtomed regulations; but are not to detriment the Two Eye Mill, in the pariſh of Melton, belonging to the deviſees of Philip Burton, eſq. lately deceaſed (ſee vol. II. p. 290); nor to take any water from Langham Brook, or from the water of Robert earl of Harborough in Saxby or Wymondham; nor to take any water from a ſpring in the lane leading from Stapleford to Wymondham, unleſs an adequate quantity of water be ſecured to lord Harborough in lieu thereof. No water is to be taken from Thorpe Brook; nor are the lands in Saxby and Wymondham to be cut through till the other parts of the canal are made. The towing-paths in Saxby and Wymondham to be made as lord Harborough ſhall direct, provided they be not carried from one ſide of the navigation to the other more than twice in either of the ſaid pariſhes; and the towing-paths through the rectorial lands of Wyverby are to be on the South ſide of the canal.

56000*l.* is authorized to be raiſed, in ſhares of 100*l.* each; with power to raiſe 20,000*l.* more if neceſſary.

The tolls to be taken are, For all coals which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed upon the ſaid navigation, the ſum of 3½*d.* per ton per mile; ſo that, to whatever extent the ſame ſhall be carried on the ſaid intended canal without being landed or unloaded, the amount of ſuch payment per ton ſhall in no caſe exceed the ſum of 3*s*.

For all iron, timber, coke, and other goods, wares, and merchandiſe (with certain exemptions for different ſorts of manure), which ſhall be navigated, carried, or conveyed upon the ſaid intended navigation, the ſum of 4½*d.* per ton per mile; ſo that, to whatever extent the ſame ſhall be carried on the ſaid intended navigation without being landed or unloaded, the amount of ſuch payment per ton ſhall in no caſe exceed the ſum of 4*s*.

For all lime, limeſtone, and ſtones, to be uſed for building, and materials for paving and repairing roads, half of the rates, tolls, and duties, hereinbefore authorized to be taken on coals.

The navigation is to be meaſured, and ſtones ſet up at the end of every mile.

George earl of Winchelſea and Nottingham being entitled to a toll, as lord of the manor of Oakham, on all coals ſold within the ſaid manor; and the quantity of coals formerly ſold being likely to be conſiderably increaſed by this navigation; an agreement is made, to pay 15*l.* a year to that nobleman, his heirs and aſſigns, as a compenſation for relinquiſhing the right of toll: but, if the navigation ſhould ever be diſcontinued, or diſuſed for ten years, then the ſaid toll to be re-taken as at preſent. The other clauſes are ſuch only as are cuſtomary.

At a public meeting at Aſhby de la Zouch, Aug. 21, 1793, notice was given of an application intended to be made to parliament, in the following ſeſſion, for making and maintaining a cut, or canal, for the purpoſes of navigation, from the Coventry canal navigation, at or near a place called Marſton Bridge, in the pariſh of Bedworth, in the county of Warwick, to, or nearly to, the town of Aſhby de la Zouch, &c.

This project was threatened with a formidable oppoſition; it having been determined, in September 1793, at a numerous and reſpectable meeting of land-owners (near fifteen miles out of thirty on the line from Aſhby Woulds to the Coventry canal at Marſton Bridge), and of other gentlemen whoſe property would be affected thereby, "that the propoſed canal is unneceſſary for the inhabitants of the counties through which it is intended to paſs, and would be very injurious to them."

On the 26th of February, 1794, a petition was preſented to the houſe of commons, from George-Harry earl of Stamford, Robert earl Ferrers, Francis Rawdon Haſtings earl of Moira, Thomas lord viſcount Wentworth, and ſeveral other perſons, reſiding in the counties of Leiceſter, Warwick, and Derby; ſtating the advantages likely to ariſe from ſuch canal; and praying that a bill for that purpoſe might be brought in. A bill was accordingly ordered to be prepared, March 4, "for making and maintaining a navigable canal, from the Coventry canal, at or near Marſton Bridge, in the pariſh of Bedworth, in the county of Warwick, to a certain cloſe, in the occupation of William Hall, called Ipſwell, or Black Ditch, in the pariſh of Aſhby de la Zouch, in the county of Leiceſter; and for continuing the ſame from thence, in one line, to the lime-works at Ticknall, in the county of Derby, and, in another line, to the lime-works at Cloudhill, in the ſaid county of Leiceſter, with certain cuts or branches for the ſaid canal." This bill was preſented March 7; committed March 12; and reported March 18. On the 24th, a petition was preſented from Penn Aſsheton Curzon, eſq. ſtating, "that the line of the propoſed canal, as deſcribed in the ſaid bill, will paſs for a conſiderable diſtance through the petitioner's eſtate in the pariſh of Shakerſton, and in ſome parts thereof within a ſmall diſtance of his manſion-houſe and pleaſure-grounds, which would interrupt the quiet enjoyment of his ſaid manſion-houſe, and be otherwiſe injurious to him; and that it appears, by ſurveys lately taken, that a deviation may be made in ſome part of the line of the ſaid canal, near the petitioner's ſaid manſion-houſe and pleaſure-grounds, which would in ſome meaſure relieve him from the inconvenience he muſt otherwiſe ſuſtain, ſhorten the line of the ſaid canal, and render the ſame more beneficial to the publick than if made in the intended line; and ſuch deviation would paſs only through the lands of the petitioner, and, for a ſmall diſtance, through the lands of certain other perſons who are conſenting thereto; and therefore praying, that proviſion may be made in the ſaid bill, for making ſuch deviation in the line of the ſaid canal, as the houſe ſhall judge ſufficient for preventing, as far as may be, the inconvenience and injury the petitioner muſt otherwiſe ſuſtain."

On the 25th, the committee had power given them to make proviſion in the bill, for varying and ſhortening the line of the ſaid canal, in certain lands belonging to Penn Aſsheton Curzon, eſq. and over certain lands belonging to Jaſper Leigh Goodwin, eſq. and Thomas Strong Hall, eſq. in the ſame pariſh.

The bill was again reported April 4; paſſed April 10; agreed to by the lords, with one amendment, April 28; to which the commons having that day conſented, it received the royal aſſent May 9.

By this act, George-Harry earl of Stamford, Robert earl Ferrers, Francis Rawdon Haſtings earl of Moira, Thomas lord viſcount Wentworth, lady Mary

Stuart counteſs dowager of Bute, George Buſſy Villiers earl of Jerſey, George Simon earl Harcourt, ſir Richard Sutton baronet, the truſtees of the late dutcheſs dowager of Marlborough's Charity at Saint Albans; the honourable John Rawdon, ſir Robert Burdett baronet, ſir George Beaumont baronet, ſir John Danvers baronet, ſir Nigel Bowyer Greſley baronet, ſir Henry Harpur baronet; and a very conſiderable number of other perſons, incorporated by the name of "The Company of Proprietors of the Aſhby de la Zouch Canal," are empowered to make, complete, and keep navigable a canal, from and out of the Coventry canal navigation, at or near a certain bridge, in the pariſh of Bedworth, in the county of Warwick, called Marſton bridge, into and through the pariſhes, townſhips, hamlets, or places of Bedworth, Marſton Jabet, and Bramcote, in the pariſh of Bulkington, Burton Haſtings, Stretton Baſkerville, and a manor or place called Le Hyde, or The Hydes, in the pariſh of Hinckley, in the county of Warwick; Sketchley, in the pariſh of Aſton Flamvile; Hinckley, Wyken, in the pariſh of Hinckley; Higham; Stoke Golding, and Dadlington, in the pariſh of Hinckley; Sutton Cheney, Shenton, and Coton, in the pariſh of Market Boſworth; Market Boſworth; Carleton, in the pariſh of Market Boſworth; Congeſton; Congeſton, in the ſeveral pariſhes of Market Boſworth, Nailſton, and Shakerſton; Shakerſton; a manor or place called Gopſall, and Snareſton, in the pariſhes of Swepſton and Shakerſton, in the county of Leiceſter; Meaſham and Okethorpe, in the ſeveral pariſhes of Stretton en le Field, Meaſham, and Greſley, in the counties of Leiceſter and Derby; Doniſthorpe, in the ſeveral pariſhes of Nether Seile, Meaſham, and Greſley, in the counties of Leiceſter and Derby; Aſhby de la Zouch; Boothorpe, in the pariſhes of Aſhby de la Zouch and Nether Seile, and Blackfordby, in the pariſh of Aſhby de la Zouch, in the county of Leiceſter; to or nearly to the ſaid cloſe called Ipſwell, or Black Ditch, in the ſaid pariſh of Aſhby de la Zouch, with a cut or branch therefrom, from, or from near, a cloſe in the ſaid hamlet, lordſhip, or liberty of Blackfordby, now or late belonging to Thomas Fletcher, and in the occupation of Thomas Harlow, called Furlong Cloſe, into and through the ſeveral pariſhes, towns, townſhips, hamlets, or places, of Aſhby de la Zouch and Nether Seile aforeſaid, and Swadlincote, in the pariſh of Church Greſley, and Church Greſley, in the county of Derby; to or near to the coal mines at Swadlincote and Church Greſley aforeſaid: And alſo to make, maintain, and keep navigable the ſaid canal, from or nearly from Ipſwell Cloſe, or Black Ditch, into and through other parts of the ſaid pariſh or lordſhip of Aſhby de la Zouch; and into or through the ſeveral pariſhes, towns, townſhips, hamlets, or places of Repton and Ticknall, in the county of Derby, to or near the lime-works at Ticknall aforeſaid, with a cut or branch therefrom, when thereto required by Robert earl Ferrers, his heirs or aſſigns, in manner thereinafter mentioned, from, or nearly from, and through, a cloſe in the pariſh or lordſhip of Aſhby de la Zouch aforeſaid, now or late in the occupation of John Sharp, called Square Cloſe; and into and through the pariſh, town, townſhip, hamlet, or place of Staunton Harold, in the ſaid county of Leiceſter, to or near to the lime-works and lead-mines at Staunton Harold aforeſaid: And alſo to make, maintain, and keep navigable the ſaid canal, from or nearly from Ipſwell Cloſe, or Black Ditch, into, through, or near, other parts of the ſaid pariſh or lordſhip of Aſhby de la Zouch, and into, through, or near, the ſeveral pariſhes, towns, townſhips, hamlets, or places, of Staunton Harold aforeſaid, and Lount, in the pariſh of Bredon, Coleorton, Newbold, and Worthington, in the ſaid pariſh of Bredon, Thringſtone, in the pariſh of Whitwick, Coleorton aforeſaid, Pegg's Green in Thringſton, in the pariſh of Whitwick aforeſaid, Thringſtone, Worthington, in the ſaid pariſh of Bredon, in the county of Leiceſter; to or near the lime-works at Cloudhill, in the pariſh of Bredon: And to ſupply the ſaid intended canal, and cuts or branches, whilſt the ſame ſhall be making; and at all times, for ever, after the ſame ſhall be made, with water from all ſuch ſprings as ſhall be found in making the ſame (except as hereinafter is mentioned), and from all rivers, brooks, ſtreams, or watercourſes whatſoever, which are or ſhall be found within the diſtance of 2000 yards from any part thereof (except as hereafter excepted), or from any reſervoir or reſervoirs belonging thereto, to be made as after mentioned; and, for thoſe purpoſes, to cleanſe, ſcour, or deepen, any ſuch rivers, brooks, ſtreams, or watercourſes, or any others which may come or be brought into, or be neceſſary for, the ſame reſpectively; and alſo to make one or more reſervoir or reſervoirs (ſo as the ſame be made within the diſtance of one mile from the ſaid canal, cuts, or branches, or either of them), for the purpoſe of ſupplying the ſaid canal, and cuts or branches, or any part thereof, with water; and to make ſuch and ſo many feeders and aqueducts, and to make, erect, and ſet up, ſuch and ſo many ſtop-gates, weirs, engines, fire-engines, and other machines, for ſupplying the ſaid canal, and cuts, or branches, and reſervoirs, with water, and for carrying water from any ſuch reſervoir and reſervoirs to the ſaid canal, and cuts or branches, or any part thereof reſpectively, or for any other purpoſe neceſſary for the better making and maintaining ſuch navigable canal, and cuts, or branches, as the ſaid company of proprietors, or their ſucceſſors, ſhall from time to time think proper and expedient. They are alſo empowered to go, enter, and paſs, the lands and grounds, rivers, brooks, ſtreams, and waters, of or belonging to the king's majeſty, or any other perſon or perſons, bodies politic, corporate, &c. and to bore, dig, cut, trench, and ſough, and to remove and lay earth, clay, ſtone, rubbiſh, trees, roots of trees, gravel or ſand, or any other matters and things which may be dug in making of the ſaid canal; and alſo to conſtruct banks, bridges, tunnels, aqueducts, ſluices, locks, weirs, pens for water, drains, wharfs, warehouſes, quays, landing-places, weigh-beams, cranes, engines, watch-houſes, dry docks, and other works, roads, ways, and conveniences, for the purpoſes of the navigation; to make, ſet out, and appoint towing-paths, banks, and ways; and alſo to dig and carry away ſoil, clay, gravel, or ſtone, in or from any grounds of any perſon or perſons adjoining or contiguous; and to conſtruct, erect, alter, keep in repair, and uſe, any aqueducts, piers, arches, and other works. Proviſion is made, that no water be taken from a ſpring ariſing in a cloſe in the occupation of William Lakin, in the lordſhip of Shakerſton aforeſaid, near Gopſal park, or from or out of the ſtream flowing from the ſame, by which the manſion-houſe of Penn Aſheton Curzon, eſq. called Gopſal Houſe, is ſupplied with water; and alſo a ſecurity of £50,000. for indemnifying Mr. Curzon for any injury that may ariſe to his ſpring near Gopſal park, in conſequence of cutting the canal. A mode of recovering compenſation for any injury that may be done to the ſaid ſpring is pointed out; and the company of proprietors engage to convey the water from the reſervoir in Gopſal park to Gopſal houſe, at their own expence. The canal is directed to be made, kept, and maintained, through the cloſes known by the names of "The Crow Tree Cloſe," "The Crow Tree Meadow," and "The Rough Cloſe," within the manor of Gopſal, in the exact line or courſe marked in a plan deſcribed in the act, and certified by the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. The following deviation from the original is then provided for. When the canal ſhall be cut through and over certain cloſes or pieces of arable meadow or paſture-ground in Gopſal aforeſaid, belonging to the ſaid Penn Aſheton Curzon, Eſq. called by the ſeveral names of Winters Rough Cloſe, Pegg's Crow Tree Meadow, and Pegg's Crow Tree Cloſe; then the line to be continued in a ſtraight direction nearly Eaſtward through two other cloſes of the ſaid Penn Aſheton Curzon, in Shakerſton aforeſaid, called Watt's Paſture, and Lakin's Paſture, and over lands and grounds belonging to Jaſper Leigh, Goodwin, eſq. in the occupation of Joſeph Earp, to a certain gate ſtanding on the public highway leading from Newton to Bilſon, in the North-eaſtern fence, dividing the lands of the ſaid Jaſper Goodwin from land of the vicar of Shakerſton, and from the ſaid gate by the ſide of or near the North-eaſtern boundary of the lands of the ſaid Jaſper Leigh Goodwin, to the Weſtern corner of a cloſe of Thomas Strong Hall, eſq. in Shakerſton aforeſaid, called the Rye Roods, and thence in a South-eaſtern direction over the ſaid Rye Roods and other cloſes of the ſaid Thomas Strong Hall, called the Walſall Cloſe, through the brick-kiln pond in the ſame cloſe, acroſs the road from Shakerſton to Hether, the Holme, and river Senſe, to the Willow Grove, part of the Ox-hay, through another part of the ſaid river, into and through the Mont-hill and Mill-meadows, through and acroſs the road leading from Shakerſton to Barton, the Pool and Pool-cloſe Meadow, into the line or courſe laid down in the plan certified by the Speaker, at the lands of Benjamin Croſhaw, at or near the South corner of the ſaid Pool-cloſe meadow. A foot-bridge is to be made over the river Senſe, and the canal for the uſe of Thomas Strong Hall, eſq. from his new garden to the cloſe called Ox-hay, at Shakerſton; and the water to be conveyed from the ſaid river into his fiſhponds in the cloſe called the Monthill; and the river Senſe ſhall be embanked ſo as that the water thereof ſhall flow fully and freely, as heretofore, to Shakerſton mill. The direction of the canal through Mr. Simpſon's eſtate, in Burton Haſtings, is pointed out; and the courſe of the canal through Snareſton eſtate. A ſwivel, or draw-bridge, to be made for the uſe of Meſſrs. Raper and Fentons to the coal-mines at Pegg's Green, and kept in repair by the company of proprietors. No towing-path to be made upon any other part of the cloſes, lands, or grounds, belonging to Robert earl Ferrers, within the liberty of Staunton Harold, than on the South ſide of the ſaid intended canal, except in the Lount wood, where it is to be on the North ſide thereof; nor upon any other part of the cloſes, lands, or grounds, of Penn Aſheton Curzon, eſq. within the pariſh of Shakerſton, or the lordſhip, manor, or liberty of Gopſall, or of Jaſper Leigh Goodwin, eſq. as mortgagee, within the ſaid pariſh of Shakerſton, than upon the North-eaſt ſide of the ſaid intended canal; nor upon any other part of the cloſes, lands, or grounds, belonging to ſir Wolſtan Dixie, bart. in the lordſhips of Market Boſworth, Carleton, and Coton, than upon the Weſt ſide of the ſaid intended canal; nor upon any other part of the cloſes, lands, or grounds, belonging to the rev. Dudley Charles Ryder, in the pariſhes of Swepſton and Shakerſton, than upon the Eaſt ſide of the ſaid intended canal. No water to be taken from the ſpring called The Holywell, in Aſhby de la Zouch; nor from the ſpring in Blackfordby; from any ſprings or brook in Repton and Ticknall; nor from Hanſon's water-houſe ſpring in Ticknall, or Aldercar in Repton; nor from the rivers Anker or Meaſe, or the Bramborough brook. The proprietors have power to make rollers, inclined planes, &c. They are not to take or damage any houſe, or other building, erected on or before Jan. 1, 1791; or any land or ground which was then ſet apart and uſed as and for a garden, yard, park, paddock, orchard, planted walk, or avenue to a houſe or lawn, incloſed or adjoining to any houſe, without the conſent of the reſpective owners thereof; other than and except a ſmall garden at Snareſton aforeſaid, belonging to the rev. Dudley Charles Ryder, in the occupation of Ellen Varnham, widow; a building uſed as a ſhop and coalhouſes; three ſmall gardens, a yard, and barn, belonging to the ſaid Dudley Charles Ryder, in the reſpective occupation of James Pearſon, Joſeph Parker, William Atwood, Thomas Marriott, and John Atkins; three ſmall gardens belonging to Joſeph Wilkes and Thomas Wilkes, eſqrs. at Meaſham aforeſaid, in the reſpective occupations of Robert Woodward, John Wildman, and William Dodge; a garden and plantation belonging to the earl of Moira in Aſhby de la Zouch, in the occupation of Middlemore Clarke Pilkington; an orchard and yard belonging to ſir Henry Harpur, bart. at Ticknall aforeſaid, in the occupation of Joſeph Henſon; a ſmall garden belonging to the ſaid ſir Henry Harpur, in Ticknall aforeſaid, in the occupation of William Neville; a yard and orchard belonging to Richard Sale, in Ticknall aforeſaid, in the occupation of James Pywell; a ſmall garden belonging to the ſaid ſir Henry Harpur, at Ticknall aforeſaid, in the occupation of John Newbold; a ſmall garden belonging to the ſaid ſir Henry Harpur, in Ticknall aforeſaid, in the occupation of Joſeph Jerram; a ſmall garden belonging to ſir George Beaumont, bart. in Newbold aforeſaid, in the occupation of John Knight; ſeven ſmall gardens and yards at Newbold and Worthington aforeſaid, belonging to Robert earl Ferrers, the ſaid ſir George Beaumont, John Mynors Bulſtrode, William Pochin, and the rev. Thomas Beer, deviſees in truſt under the will of Edward Dawſon, eſq. deceaſed; Joſeph Boultbee, eſq. William Jacques, John Huſkiſſon, Joſeph Jacques Huſkiſſon, —— Huſbands, William Frearſon, John Broadhurſt, eſq. widow Jackſon, Joſeph Ward and Robert Ward, John Armſton, Michael Goodall, Thomas Wallis, Anne Curzon, William Pochin, eſq. and William Stinſon, in the reſpective occupations of William Poxon, Thomas Stacey, John Maſſey, Thomas Haywood, John Field, Joſeph Wardle, and John Hall; a ſmall garden at Coleorton aforeſaid, belonging to the ſaid ſir George Beaumont, in the occupation of Ann Wardle; a ſmall garden at Pegg's Green aforeſaid, belonging to John Raper, Thomas Fenton, and James Fenton, in the occupation of William Cooper; a barn, ſtable, and ſmall garden, belonging to the earl of Stamford, in Worthington aforeſaid, in the occupation of John Bailey; another ſmall garden of the earl of Stamford, in Worthington aforeſaid, in the occupation of Thomas Orton. A cut, or branch, is to be made to earl Ferrers's limeworks, when he ſhall require it, from or nearly from the ſaid cloſe, in the pariſh of Aſhby de la Zouch aforeſaid, now or late in the occupation of John Sharp, called Square Cloſe; and thence, through the incloſures of the ſaid earl, in the lordſhip of Staunton Harold, over the corner of the park at Staunton Harold, to within about 170 yards of his preſent lime-works at Staunton Harold. Sir Henry Harpur is enabled to make a railway, or ſtone, or other road, from his lime-works, when earl Ferrers ſhall require his cut, railway, &c.; William Abney, eſq. to make a cut or railway from Hether colliery, into the canal near Shakerſton; and William Fermor, eſq. from any coalmines of his in the lordſhip of Normanton on the Heath. The proprietors are authorized to make a wharf at ſome convenient place upon Aſhby Woulds, near the pariſh of Hartſhorne; and another wharf at ſome convenient place, at or near Greenhill's Paſtures, in the lordſhip of Sutton Cheney, for the accommodation of the inhabitants of the towns, villages, and places, adjoining thereto. The canal to be completed to the lime-works within five years. Levels and ſurveys having been taken, and four plans and books of reference made; the ſaid plans and books are directed to be authenticated by the Speaker, and allowed to be given in evidence. The canal not to deviate from the courſe laid down in thoſe plans. The lord of the manor of Aſhby de la Zouch for the time being, and the vicar of the pariſh of Aſhby de la Zouch for the time being, and Francis Burdett, eſq. and his heirs, are conſtituted and appointed truſtees for receiving from the proprietors the ſums of money at which the commonable lands on Aſhby Woulds, taken for the purpoſes of the ſaid navigation, ſhall be valued, and for placing out the ſame money, to accumulate, until an incloſure (if any) of Aſhby Woulds ſhall take place; then to be equitably applied according to the ſeveral reſpective intereſts; but, in caſe no ſuch incloſure take place within twenty years from the commencement of this act, then the truſtees are authorized to pay the whole or any part of the ſaid money ſo veſted in them as aforeſaid, and the accumulations thereof, in ſuch manner as ſhall be determined by the lord of the manor, impropriator, or owner of the great tithes, and a majority in number of the land-owners having right of common on Aſhby Woulds, as ſhall attend at a meeting convened for that purpoſe by public advertiſement in the county of Leiceſter; the impropriator or owner of the ſaid great tithes being firſt paid and allowed thereout ſuch a proportion of the ſaid money as ſhall be agreed upon at ſuch meeting as above-mentioned, for or in lieu of ſuch great tithes. Mills injured by the navigation to be purchaſed by the company, if ſo required by the owner, or otherwiſe altered and improved. Towing-paths, &c. to be fenced off from adjoining lands. Gates and ſtiles to be erected on the towing-paths, &c. It being apprehended that damage may be done by great floods, or inundations, to the lands of the earl of Moira, ſituate in Melbourne, in the county of Derby, and alſo to the lands of the lord viſcount Melbourne, ſituate in Melbourne, and in the liberty of Derby Hills, lying below the level of the ſaid intended canal, in caſe the increaſe of waters, brought into the ſaid canal by means of floods and inundations, ſhall not have a ſufficient outlet through ſome watercourſe or brook running into the river Trent; it is enacted, that, in caſe any ſuch damage ſhall or may be done, the proprietors for the time being are required, at their own proper coſts, to make, or cauſe to be made, ſuch ſufficient weir or weirs on the ſide of the ſaid canal, and to deepen and widen the ſeveral rivulets or brooks called Melbourne Brook, Wilſton Brook, and Scotch Brook, in the pariſh of Melbourne, and in the liberty of Derby Hills, or ſuch of them as may be neceſſary and effectual for the letting off the waſte water through Melbourne brook into the river Trent, at or near Weſton cliff in the ſaid county of Derby. The canal not to go over any of the cloſes of the truſtees of the eſtates of the late Edward Dawſon, deceaſed, at Stoke Golding, except thoſe particularized in the plan, &c.; and the company to build a carriage-bridge in ſuch place as the truſtees ſhall direct. The proprietors are empowered to raiſe £150,000. in 1500 equal ſhares. The rates of tonnage to be taken are: For all coals, lime, and ſlate, one penny farthing per ton, per mile: for iron-ſtone, building-ſtone, grinding-ſtone, lime-ſtone, bricks, and tiles; and for all cattle, ſheep, ſwine, and other beaſts; three farthings per ton, per mile: for cotton, wool, and hops; corn, timber, bark, wrought iron, cheeſe, and all other articles (except dung, aſhes, marle, and clay for manure; gravel, ſand, and ſtones for roads); two pence per ton, per mile. But none of theſe rates to be taken for any dung, aſhes, marle, or clay for manure; nor for any gravel, ſand, or other materials, to be uſed for the purpoſe only of making or repairing any public roads. The right of fiſhery is reſerved to lords of manors and land-owners; who are alſo allowed to uſe pleaſure-boats. Some proviſional clauſes are inſerted, for ſettling, regulating, and ſecuring, a compenſation to ſir George Beaumont, in reſpect of his collieries at Coleorton; with liberty for the company, as an indemnification, to purchaſe coals at ſir George Beaumont's collieries. A compenſation alſo to be made to the Coventry canal company; who are authorized to take the ſame tolls as if the junction of the Aſhby de la Zouch canal had been made at Griff, inſtead of Marſton-bridge. A clauſe for preventing any diminution of water in the Coventry canal; and a toll-houſe to be erected at or near the ſide of any part of the ſaid Aſhby de la Zouch canal, for collecting rates payable to the Coventry canal company: but no perſon to be ſubject to payment of toll to the proprietors of the Coventry canal, for any corn or grain, or any ſheep or other cattle, or any iron-ſtone, or wrought iron, got or made upon or near the banks of the Aſhby de la Zouch canal, or for any dung, aſhes, marle, for manure; gravel, ſand, and ſtones for repairs of roads. Compenſation to be made to the Leiceſter navigation company, for their expences in making a communication, by railways and water-levels, between the baſon of the company of proprietors of the Soar navigation, and ſeveral coal-works and mines opened and worked in Swannington and Coleorton, and in Thringſton common, all in the ſaid county of Leiceſter, for the benefit and accommodation of the owners and leſſees of the ſaid coal-works and mines (the whole of which expences will exceed £30,000.) by authorizing them to take, for the tonnage of all coals conveyed from any coal-works, mines, or places, now opened and worked, in Swannington and Coleorton, or either of them, or in Thringſton common, upon the Aſhby de la Zouch canal, and which ſhall paſs into and along the ſame canal, and beyond a certain cloſe in the lordſhip of Blackfordby marked in the plan, the ſum of two ſhillings and ſix pence per ton. And no water is to be taken which may be wanted to ſupply the water-levels belonging to the Leiceſter canal company. The other clauſes are ſuch only as are uſual in all acts of a ſimilar nature.

Notice having been regularly given of an intended application for a bill to alter and amend an act of 23 Geo. III. "for improving the navigation of the river Trent, from a place called Wilden Ferry, in the counties of Derby and Leiceſter, or one of them, to Gainſborough, in the county of Lincoln; and for empowering perſons navigating veſſels thereon to hale the ſame with horſes; and for improving the navigation of the ſaid river, and for enlarging and improving the haling-paths, and making other haling-paths upon the banks thereof; which ſaid river or haling-paths are ſituate in the ſeveral pariſhes or townſhips of Caſtle Donington, Lockington, and Hemington, in the county of Leiceſter; Wilden, Aſton, Shardlow, Sawley, and Long Eaton, in the county of Derby; and ſeveral other places in the counties of Nottingham and Leiceſter; and for making ſeveral communicating cuts; particularly to maintain a navigable cut, already made, to communicate with the river Trent, in Hemington paſture, in the townſhips of Hemington and Lockington: A petition was preſented, Feb. 25, 1794; ſtating, among other matters, that it would be expedient to maintain a navigable cut, or canal, already made, to communicate with the river Trent in Hemington paſture, in the pariſh of Lockington.

The bill was preſented March 12; on the 26th a petition againſt it from the corporation of Nottingham; and on the 28th another from Elizabeth Bainbridge, of Woodborow, in the county of Nottingham, ſpinſter; ſtating, "that the petitioner is ſole proprietor of all the lands and grounds within the lordſhip of Lockington, in the county of Leiceſter (except two meadows, containing about eighteen acres, called The Pen Meadows, the property of Penn Aſsheton Curzon, eſq.); and that two rivulets, or brooks, the one called Hemington Brook, and the other called Lockington Brook, run through a great part of the lordſhip of Lockington, and join each other in the ſaid lordſhip, and, after ſuch junction, empty themſelves into the river Soar, about 300 yards before the ſaid river Soar communicates with the river Trent; and that the petitioner is informed, that a bill is depending in the houſe, to alter and amend an act, of the 23d year of his preſent majeſty, for improving the navigation of the river Trent, and for making and maintaining a navigable canal from the ſaid river, in the pariſh of Beeſton, to join the Nottingham canal in the pariſh of Lenton, in the county of Nottingham, and alſo certain cuts on the ſide of the ſaid river; or that a dam or weir is intended to be made over the ſaid river Trent, below and near to the Soar mouth, five or ſix feet high, in order to pen and dam up the water to the lock at the lower end of Sawley new cut; and ſuch dam or weir will pen and dam up the water five or ſix feet higher in the ſaid brooks running through the petitioner's lands and grounds than they have heretofore uſually been, or would be in caſe ſuch dam or weir was not made, and thereby the drainage of the petitioner's eſtate will be completely ſtopped up, upwards of forty acres of valuable land laid under water, and her property otherwiſe greatly injured, to an extent not at preſent to be aſcertained; and therefore praying, that the dam, or weir, intended to be made over or acroſs the ſaid river Trent, below and near to the Soar mouth, may not be made, and that the petitioner may be heard, by her counſel, againſt the power to be given for making ſuch dam or weir."

After hearing counſel on the petitions, the bill was reported April 11; paſſed April 15; agreed to by the lords April 28; and received the royal aſſent May 9.

A CATALOGUE of ſome of the more RARE PLANTS found in the Neighbourhood of LEICESTER, LOUGHBOROUGH, and in CHARLEY FOREST.

INTRODUCTION.

LEICESTERSHIRE is almoſt the only county in England, of which the plants are unnoticed by biſhop Gibſon among the catalogues ſubjoined to his enlarged edition of Camden's Britannia: and, as it is known that Mr. Ray communicated thoſe liſts, it ſeems to follow, that this county had not been particularly examined by that excellent naturaliſt, in the ſeveral journeys which he made for the improvement of Engliſh botany. We find, indeed, from the ſecond edition of Ray's Synopſis, that Mr. Petiver had not neglected this county, as he appears to have been the firſt who diſcovered the lichen jubatus to grow in England; having found it on the higheſt rocks in Charnwood (or, as it is more commonly called, Charley) Foreſt; a part of the county, ſo favourable to the production of the more rare plants, that, if Mr. Ray had ever ſearched it, it is ſcarcely to be imagined, but that ſome notices of it muſt have occurred in his writings; eſpecially as we find that it actually does produce ſeveral plants, which were at that period accounted rare.

However, although this county was not particularly noticed by the curious of the laſt age, ſuch as are acquainted with the preſent ſtate of Engliſh botany, will not expect to hear that it produces many plants which are not alſo commonly found in the neighbouring counties, ſince the midland parts of the kingdom afford nearly the ſame kinds, allowing for thoſe differences of ſoil, and elevation of country, which favour, in a particular manner, the production of certain ſpecies. To inſtance, as it does not abound in chalk, Leiceſterſhire in general is almoſt deſtitute of thoſe plants which delight in that ſoil. To mention, among many others, the campanula glomerata, leſſer bell-flower; ſpiræa filipendula, common drop-wort; ſtatice armeria, common thrift; reſeda lutea, yellow baſe rocket; thymus acinos, corn-thyme; Anthyllis vulneraria, kidney vetch; hedyſarum onobrychis, common ſaint-foin; and ſeveral others, which are ſcarcely ſeen on the Weſtern ſide of the county, but begin to occur on the Eaſt, and North-eaſtern ſide, where the chalky ſoil in ſome degree takes place, and at length prevails in the neighbouring part of Lincolnſhire.

Leiceſterſhire being in general a rich and well-cultivated county, and having the advantage of a fine river running through the middle of it, ſeveral extenſive woods, and a mixture of open and incloſed fields, together with a conſiderable difference of ſoil, being in ſome parts light and gravelly, in others conſiſting of rich black mould, and elſewhere a deep ſtrong clay, it is thus rendered favourable to the production of a great variety of vegetables. Add to theſe, a farther ſcope, occaſioned by that large tract of land before-mentioned, called Charley Foreſt; great part of which is almoſt as much in a ſtate of nature as any part of England. It is in ſuch ſituations, where the pruning and cultivating hand of art has ſcarcely been felt, that the truly native plants of every kingdom are principally to be met with; ſince it is highly probable, that a very great number of thoſe which are frequent in paſtures, and poſſibly almoſt all thoſe of the arable lands, have been in diſtant times gradually and inſenſibly introduced into this iſland with foreign grain, and by other accidental modes of intercourſe between this iſland and the continent. The ſpecific diſcrimination of theſe plants, and the aſſignation of them to the ſeveral originally ſpontaneous places of growth, would be a curious diſquiſition, and worthy of the moſt able botanical Antiquary. But to return. The wild and uncultivated ſtate of this foreſt, and the various elevations of its ſeveral parts, renders it a nurſery for many plants which do not grow on cultivated land. Hence, allowing for its extent, and its being an inland county, Leiceſterſhire probably furniſhes to the botaniſt, as conſiderable a variety as any of the midland counties of England. Some parts of Charley Foreſt are elevated into conſiderable hills, bearing ſome reſemblance to the Peak of Derbyſhire; particularly thoſe known by the names of Beacon Hill, Bardon Hill, Ives Head, Cliff Hill, &c. From the two former of theſe the views in clear weather are very extenſive; reaching, not only over a large part of the neighbouring counties, but even to the mountains of Wales. In proceeding Northwards by a direct line from the Southern parts of the kingdom, theſe hills are, I believe, the firſt part of the chain or ridge, which at length conſtitutes the Peak of Derbyſhire, and which is continued from thence to the moſt Northern part of the kingdom. The ſummits of many of theſe hills, particularly that of Beacon Hill, which is conſidered as the higheſt, conſiſt of vaſt naked craggy rocks, the crags almoſt univerſally facing the Weſt. They are compoſed of a very hard grey ſtone, very like the blue Elvan ſtone of Cornwall, but not ſo fiſſile. It is of an extremely cloſe grit, gives fire with ſteel, from whence quartz ſeems to predominate in its compoſition, and ſome parts of it are almoſt irreſiſtible to the hammer. Others of theſe rocks are compoſed of an imperfect kind of granite, of which a much more complete ſort abounds in the neighbourhood of Mountſorrel, where it is uſed in buildings, in the pavement of the ſtreets, and to mend the high roads. The moſt perfect of the Mountſorrel granite is compoſed of red quartz, white felt-ſpat, and black ſhirl or cockle, blended in a nearly equal proportion. It is one of the moſt compact of all granites, none of the red granites of Cornwall being ſuperior to it in hardneſs.

Before Mr. Ray publiſhed his Catalogus Plantarum Angliæ in 1670, there was no ſeparate general account of Engliſh botany that could be depended upon. The Phytologia of How, in 1650, and the pinax of Merrett, in 1667, were not ſufficiently accurate to ſatisfy the critical botaniſt. From Ray's Catalogue we find that, at that period, the whole number of plants diſcovered as ſpontaneouſly growing in England, did not amount to eleven hundred ſpecies. Of theſe, more than one thouſand conſiſted of what were called the more perfect plants, as trees, ſhrubs, graminaceous and other herbs; and not quite one hundred of the ferns, moſſes, and muſhroom order, ſince comprehended under the name of cryptogamous plants. So great had been the diligence of Mr. Ray and his contemporaries, that, at the diſtance of an hundred years after his publication, the augmentation to the preſent plants did not exceed ſixty or ſeventy ſpecies. In the mean while, by the accumulated diſcoveries of ſubſequent naturaliſts, and eſpecially of late years, ſuch has been the attention paid to the cryptogamous claſs, that at this time the Engliſh ſpecies alone amount to upwards of nine hundred; and England, therefore, by preſent eſtimations, furniſhes upwards of two thouſand diſtinct ſpecies of vegetables: of theſe above two hundred are ſtrictly marine and maritime plants, being never found at any conſiderable diſtance from the ſhore, unleſs where the ſalt-water has acceſs into the country by means of the tide in rivers. Hence it follows, that the inland country of Britain cannot furniſh more than between ſeventeen and eighteen hundred ſpecies. And, on a further calculation, about four hundred of theſe are either Alpine or local plants; the former inhabiting only the ſummits of the higheſt mountains in Wales, Yorkſhire, Weſtmorland, Cumberland, and Scotland; the latter, only particular parts of the kingdom. Thus ſeveral ſpecies are only found, as far as is hitherto known, in Wales: many are common in the Northern and mountainous tracts of England which do but rarely occur in the Southern counties. A certain number have, as yet, been found only in Cornwall, and ſome only in the Eaſtern counties, as Norfolk and Suffolk. The fenny countries produce ſeveral that are rarely ſeen elſewhere; and the chalky ſoil is peculiarly adapted to a very conſiderable number.

There are few ſituations comprehending a circuit of ten or twelve miles in diameter, that will not yield to the inveſtigation of a diligent botaniſt upwards of a thouſand ſpecies, including the cryptogamiæ. The environs of Leiceſter are known to produce much beyond this number; and there is no doubt but that a ſkilful and diligent inveſtigator might make a very conſiderable acceſſion to it.

To enumerate all the common plants would be ſuperfluous, and inconſiſtent with the general deſign of this work; nor would it be leſs ſo to introduce either critical obſervations or diſſertations on the uſes of the ſeveral ſubjects. What is here meant to be done, is only to facilitate the enquiries of the curious, by pointing out the ſpecific ſituation of the more rare ſpecies. This catalogue is principally confined to ſuch as occur in the neighbourhood of Leiceſter, Loughborough, and in and near to Charley Foreſt. The compiler has no doubt, that it might have been much more complete, had it been made in conſequence of determined and appropriate enquiries: but, on the contrary, it is neceſſary to add, that it is wholly the reſult of incidental obſervations made in the early part of life. It was compiled many years ago, nearly in the ſtate in which the reader now ſees it, at the requeſt of the Rev. Dr. Farmer, at the time that gentleman had ſome intentions of publiſhing a Hiſtory of the Town of Leiceſter, with a view to have been inſerted in that work [1]. It became proper to mention theſe circumſtances, not only becauſe the compiler has not had it in his power, ſince that time, to make any acceſſions to it, but, becauſe it muſt be almoſt certain that ſuch alterations muſt, in ſeveral inſtances, have taken place, through cultivation, or other cauſes, that ſome of the plants may no longer be found growing as noticed at the period above-mentioned.

That the following liſt might be comprized in as compendious a form as was conſiſtent with accuracy, the trivial names only of Linnæus, from the ſecond edition of his Species Plantarum, are made uſe of: to which are added, a Reference to one, at leaſt, of the beſt figures of each plant, as far as the author had an opportunity of conſulting them [2].

THE NATURAL HISTORY

OF

THE VALE OF BELVOIR.

By the Rev. GEORGE CRABBE, B. D. Rector of MUSTON.

> " ——— Do but compare the Country where I lye,
> " My Hill and Oulds will say, they are the Island's eye.
> " Consider next my Site, and say it doth excell;
> " Then come unto my Soil, and you shall see it swell
> " With every grass and grain that Britain forth can bring;
> " I challenge any Vale, to shew me but that thing
> " I cannot shew to her, that truly is my own."
> DRAYTON, Poly-olbion, Song XXVI.

THAT part of the County of Leicester called The Vale[1] of Belvoir lies to the North, North-west, and South-west of Belvoir Castle, without any definable limit; and under this name are comprehended a part of Nottinghamshire and a few parishes in the county of Lincoln.

The soil, as well as the first appearance, is uniform, with very little diversity of wood or water. Viewed from the Castle, or the hill of Belvoir, the whole country appears flat, and the prospect rather extensive than agreeable; yet it grows interesting upon a further examination, and gains in fertility what it loses in variety.

The Natural History of such a country may seem of little importance, and confined to a few objects; but whatever may be the case with the common observer, or the admirer of general views, the Naturalist will certainly meet with much to engage his attention, and pay his researches.

This is more particularly true in the department of Natural History which relates to Fossiology, and especially the division of Petrefactions: in the higher classes of the three kingdoms (the Tria Regna Naturæ of Linné) little can be expected. Our Beasts, Birds, Reptiles, and Fishes, are already described; and few or none of them can be considered as local curiosities. Our Insects are more numerous, more local, and defined with more uncertainty. The Vermes of an Inland County can but little engage our attention; and in the Vegetable Race, the Botanist will scarcely expect more than the places or growth for some particular plants, and a description of one or two individuals. The Minerals and Fossils will therefore engage us longer than any other objects of Natural History; and of these some account shall be given of all the Genera, with a few of the Species, and mention shall be made of certain Varieties.

The MAMMALIA of the Vale of Belvoir are not perhaps sufficiently distinguished by any form or property to merit a peculiar description. The labouring Horses are large and heavy, and their prevailing colour is black; the Cows are of a middle size, and of the horned breed. The Sheep are less than those of Lincolnshire; yet large, and yearly improving from the breed introduced by Mr. Bakewell of Dishley, a gentleman who is much celebrated for his attention to this part of rural œconomy[2].

The Chace-deer belonging to the Duke of Rutland range in considerable numbers over the Vale and the adjacent parts of the Hill country; yet, through the liberality of the family, and their regard to the interests of the farmer, they are fewer than in former times, when the tillage of the soil was loaded with the heavy expence of nightly watchmen for the preservation of their crops[3].

The remaining animals, which, being Feræ Natura, are yet not considered as common right, are Hares and Rabbits; the former are found plentifully in most parts of the Vale; and the latter, of a very fine kind, at the foot and along the declivity of the hill which leads from the Castle to the parish of Stathern.

This and the neighbouring hill-country are celebrated for hunting, and many Foxes are found here: a few years since, two very beautiful ones, of the black kind, were turned off from Croxton Park by the Duke of Rutland, with a view to their associating with the common kind, and they did so; but it does not appear to have added any thing to the variety or pleasure of the chace.

In the river Devon is sometimes found the Otter[4], but this happens rarely; and Badgers[5] have been taken, but not often, in the woods of Barston and Stathern.

The Fitchet[6], or Polecat, makes its usual devastation in this country, and, with the Weasel[7] and Ermine[8], may be frequently met with.

The Cream-coloured Mole[9], a variety of the common kind, which is mentioned by Mr. Pennant as inhabiting his lands near Downing, is also found in the Southern part of the Vale, but more frequently about the parish of Dalby; it particularly possesses one inclosure, from which it has almost excluded the black kind, and made them, though in all the neighbourhood very plentiful, the scarcer animal in that meadow.

The smaller Quadrupeds in the order of the Mammalia called Glires by Linné, which are common throughout the kingdom, need not be noticed as inhabitants of a particular part of it, as they are neither found in great numbers, nor are totally strangers.

The BIRDS in this neighbourhood will not long engage our attention. The Kite is very common in the woods between Belvoir and Stathern, and is at almost all times gliding over the burrows of the Rabbits. Of the Pie kind, Woodpeckers and Jays are numerous. The Hooded Crow is seldom seen; and the Hoopo is totally a stranger[10]. The Kingfisher is more frequent in the Southern part of the Vale than might be supposed from its inland situation, and the smallness of its streams. The Gallinaceous

III. p. 759." G. A.

[10] "The Crane, Egrett, Bohem. Chatterer, Snowflake, are as much strangers as the Hoopo. I have seen the Bearded Manica, actually shot near Melton Mowbray. The Nightingale doth not migrate far North; but, what is more extraordinary, is a stranger to Devonshire and Cornwall, where Myrtles grow to the tops of cottages." G. A.

Tribe (exclusive of domestic birds) affords only Partridges and Quails. Pheasants have been liberated in the woods about Belvoir, but do not increase there.

The divisions of Anseres and Grallæ, the water-birds of Ornithologists, give us few species, as may be imagined from the situation of the country, and its want of lakes and rivers of any considerable magnitude. Even in the numerous order of Passeres, or small birds, what is remarkable is rather the absence of the common kind, than the presence of the scarce. The Nightingale is seldom heard; and the melody of these woods wants the addition of many little warblers, who gladden other groves, and meliorate the notes of their more harsh and dissonant inhabitants.

It has been remarked, by some attentive observers for many years, that Swallows which visit the Vale of Belvoir enter it from the North-east; and commonly assemble and rest a few days about the parish of Foston in Lincolnshire, before their dispersion through the adjacent country.

The AMPHIBIA of Linné are divided into Reptilia, Serpentes, Nantes.

Of Reptiles. The Vale of Belvoir possesses the common Frog[1] and Toad[2]; the scaly Lizard[3], and Water Newt[4]; the green Lizard, a variety of the scaly[5], has also been found in the turfty pastures below Barston-wood; it differs in no respect but colour from the common kind; the length is generally about six inches; and the scales are a pale blue-green without any variation.

No Serpents[6] are found in this part of Leicestershire, or, if any, very few. A person who has frequently searched the country for every object of Natural History, for six years past, has never met with either the Viper[7], Snake[8], or Blind Worm[9], all which are common in the warm and sandy banks and hedges in many parts of England.

The division Nantes contains no species to be met with in the fresh waters of this kingdom.

FISHES are the next division of the animal system: of these, the little streams[10] which run across the Vale into the Trent afford but few. The Dace, the Roach, the Gudgeon, and the Eel, are the most common; some Pike are found here, with a few Perch; the bearded Loche [Pennant] inhabits a few clear and rapid brooks, and the Trout are occasionally caught (but are not indigenous) in the stony part of the river Devon. If to these be added the Minow, the the Stikleback, and the Amphisbœna aquatica of Bertrusius, Albertus, &c. or the Gordius aquaticus of Linné, this part of the Natural History of the Vale will be sufficiently noticed.

INSECTS are divided by Linné into seven classes[11]:

1. Coleoptera: Beetles.
2. Hemiptera: Grasshoppers, Bugs, &c.
3. Lepidoptera: Butterflies and Moths.
4. Neuroptera: Dragon flies, Ephemeræ, &c.
5. Hymenoptera: Bees, Wasps, &c.
6. Diptera: Common Flies and two-winged Insects.
7. Aptera: Insects without wings.

The number of species in each of these classes, and more especially in the 1st, 3d, and 6th, is very large in every part of this kingdom: continual additions are made to our knowledge, and every year produces the discovery of some new species: a collector of insects will in vain search the writings of Linné, Scopoli, De Geer, Fabricius, and even the authors of our own country, for many which he will find in the Vale of Belvoir; he will, however, by this means see their affinity, and the place they hold among those already described.

Of these Non-descripts it is not intended to give here a particular account, as that belongs to a work purely entomological, but to mention circumstances only which seem appropriate to the country.

COLEOPTEROUS INSECTS, of the most common kind in many other parts of the kingdom, are here very scarce; and others are frequently met with which are considered as uncommon both in the North and South of England; even the Scarabœus melolontha (the common Cockchafer) in some years is scarcely to be met with without a particular search, when they are very numerous in almost every other county. In the year 1787 the oaks about Doncaster were entirely stripped by them; while those in the woods of Stathern and Barston had none about them, but were spoiled in an almost equal degree by the larva of the Phalœna viridata, the small green Oak Moth, which frequent these woods in numbers truly astonishing.

The Lucanus Cervus, or Stag Beetle, is never found here, nor perhaps in any part of England so far North; but the Lucanus parallelopipedus is very frequently seen in old wood and decayed trees; it is about the length of the common Dor, or Clock (Scarabœus Stercorarius); but is flat, and has its jaws projecting forward about the length of its head, with one dent in the middle of each: it has the name parallelopipedus from the equal breadth of its head, thorax, and abdomen, a circumstance not often occurring in this, or perhaps any class of insects.

The Scarabœus cylindricus inhabits the old willows which are half decayed: it has a form the reverse of the last mentioned, being very elevated in the thorax, and almost cylindrical: the thorax has five sharp dents; and the small head, which is nearly concealed, has an erect horn; the wing-cases (elytra) are hard, punched, and shining. This insect, though not very scarce, is noticed for the singularity of its make, there being very few of the kind in this kingdom.

Dermestes murinus (Systema Naturæ, Tom. II. p. 563.) is found in Stathern wood, but not, as Linné mentions, "in cadaveribus;" it haunts the mossy stumps of various trees.

Ips rufipes (Mantissa Insectorum Fabricii, Tom. I. p. 45.) is not described by Linné. It is found in the bark of willow and other trees about Belvoir Castle, but is a scarce insect.

Ptinus imperialis, Systema Naturæ II. 566.

This is described by Linné as being the size of a wheat grain, with the figure of a white spread-eagle upon the back of it. It is found at Stathern, but not of equal magnitude.

Silpha Germanica. Sys. Natur. 569. Nigrophorus Fabricii.

Cassida murrœa. Sys. Natur. 575.

This, with three or four varieties, is frequent upon the Inula dysenterica, and some other plants.

Coccinellæ. Sys. Natur. 579.

These insects are commonly known by the names of Lady-Cow and Lady-Bird; they are generally red or yellow, with black spots; some black, with red spots; others red, with white spots; and, lastly, some black with white or yellow spots. Of these about sixteen species are met with in the woods of Stathern and Barston, or other parts of the Vale, the most rare of which is the Coccinella 16-guttata; a variety of the common kind, or 7-punctata, often occurs here, with an additional spot upon each elytra.

Ips Boleti. See Mersham's Entomologia Britannica, p. 59.

Elongated; brown, the shells crenated and furrowed. In Boletus. It is a rare insect, found at Muston.

Chrysomela halensis. Entomologia Britannica, 177.

Yellowish; the head and wing-cases green-gold; the antennæ and feet brownish. Frequent in meadows about Muston.

Chrysomela Tanaceti. Sys. Natur. 587.

This is a very common insect, about one third of an inch in length, rough, black, ovate, and punctuated; it is often found single upon ant-hills and in meadows; but, at particular times, they assemble in great abundance, and almost cover the ground for a considerable space, so that many thousands might be taken at once: this happens likewise to the Coccinella 7-punctata before mentioned, but not in this neighbourhood. On the coast of Suffolk it is not unfrequent to see them lie dead upon the beach very near the sea in prodigious numbers, probably caused by their flight over the water, to a distance from which they are unable to return; and so falling into it, they are drowned, and thrown upon the shore[1].

Chrysomela oleracea. Sys. Natur. 593.

This small blue shining insect is very common and destructive in gardens, and among turnips and plants of that kind: it is called by Farmers simply "The Fly," and is extremely injurious to the seed-leaves of the young plants; it leaps with great force and velocity: the spring is the more common season for it; but it infests gardens all the summer: a preventive which would be effectual, and not very expensive, is much to be desired: soot strewed upon the bed, and lime, are not sufficiently powerful.

The Chrysomela nemorum differs, in having a yellow border round the elytra.

It is almost equally destructive.

Bruchus granarius. Sys. Natur. 605.

In farm-yards and about corn-stacks early in the spring.

Curculio. Sys. Natur. 606.

Many small species of this genus are found here; but happily that pernicious one, the Curculio granarius, the Weevil or Boud, seldom haunts the granaries in this neighbourhood. Another species of the same genus, Curculio lineatus, may be seen in great plenty among grain of every kind, and at almost every part of the year; but, as it does not deposit its egg in any sort, no injury is sustained by its numbers; this is about one fifth of an inch long, the colour grey, the thorax having three paler lines marked upon it.

Attalabus. This is called by Fabricius Clerus; and the second species of that author, Clerus dubius, flies here, but not frequently; another species, hereafter described, is also found, but is very scarce.

Cerambyx moschatus. Sys. Natur. 627. The Goatchafer.

This insect smells strongly of musk: it is bright green, with a tinge of gold; the length of the antennæ is about one inch and an half, and the body an inch long: it haunts willows, and some other trees, in July and August.

Cerambyx meridianus, p. 630. also occurs, but rarely.

Leptura. The beautiful species of this genus, called Leptura arietis and arcuata, with the florale (Calidium florale of Fabricius), fly in the woods below Belvoir, with several other species of this and the last-mentioned genus.

Elater. Sys. Natur. 651.

This is distinguished from every other genus of insect by a power of springing upwards with considerable force when laid upon the back: many frequent this country; and some of them, as the sanguineus and æneus, are beautiful insects; as is the Cupreus of Fabricius, the elytra being half yellow and half copper-green, with pectinated black antennæ: it is common about Stathern.

Cicindela. Sys. Natur. 657.

The Cicindela campestris, a common, but beautiful insect, flies here early in the spring: it is a gold-green, with silver-white spots; the length about half an inch.

Dytiscus: the Water-beetle. Sys. Nat. 664.

One of our largest insects is the Dytiscus marginatus, common in the pools of this country, with many other species of Dytiscus, a genus which agree in form, and vary in size more than most others.

Carabus. Sys. Natur. 631.

The Carabi are the most common of this class of insects; they are called Ground-beetles; are most of them black with some fœtor; they are very swift, and very voracious. Forty species at least may be taken in and about the gardens of Belvoir Castle; of which the coriaceus, granulatus, violaceus, and inquisitor, occur most frequently of the large kind. It may not be uninteresting to collectors in this department of Natural History, to be informed that the large and beautiful species of this genus Carabus Sycophanta, the body violet colour, and the shells golden-green with longitudinal striæ, has been found alive in this country. By many it is considered as a doubtful native.

Meloe proscarabœus. Sys. Natur. p. 679.

This insect is large and slow; its wing-cases cover only half the abdomen, and it has no wings: it frequents warm hedges and pastures early in the spring; on being touched, there issues from the joints and sections of the body a bright red pellucid liquor. Scopoli says, that in the male insect the elytra are longer than the abdomen, but no such occur here.

Staphylinus. Sys. Natur. 683.

Many species of this genus fly in this country throughout the summer: they feed upon dead and putrid flesh; are long and slender; and the elytra cover about one third of the abdomen.

Staphylinus maxillosus: the largest species is frequent in every part of the Vale.

Staphylinus balteatus De Geer, called by Linné and Fabricius a variety of the former, or the Junior Insect, is sometimes seen upon dead bodies of sheep, horses, &c.; but is evidently a different species, in form as well as colour distinguished from the maxillosus.

Staphylinus rufus: sometimes seen in fungis.

Forficula: the Earwig

Forficula minor: the small Earwig, being about one third of the common size, frequents gardens in the spring.

---

[1] "This Hasselquist saw happen to Locusts, a long-winged insect; yet Marshal, Norfolk Husbandry, can think that the next insect (Chrysomela oleracea) can fly from Siberia to Norfolk!" G. A.

To this short account of some species already described, may be added the three following, which have not been noticed: it would be easy to add many others if the limits of this work permitted.

Scarabœus obscurus:

Melolontha obscura .... according to Fabricius.

In size and shape it exactly resembles the Scarabeus horticula; but the elytra are a shining black, together with the thorax, and every other part of the insect: it seems to have been confounded with the Horticola by Entomologists, from which it differs in colour; nor is it found with it in gardens, or among fruit-trees, but generally flying single in open fields or meadows.

It is equally hairy with those of the Melolontha kind; its antennæ have 3 lamina; and the spines of its anterior tibia are two.

Attalabus ruficollis. Clerus Fabricii.

Niger, thorace rufo, elytris nigris striato-punctatis habitat circa Muston, sed rarius.

It is five lines long, and the elytra one and a half broad; the thorax is red; the head, elytra, abdomen, and pectinated antennæ, shining black; the posterior palpi long and securiform, which constitute the character of the Clerus according to Fabricius.

Dytiscus perpusillus. Hydrophilus of Fabricius.

Niger, thorace lævi, elytris punctato-striatis.

This is the smallest insect of this class hitherto described. It is difficult to fix the genus, but the antennæ are perfoliate as in the Hydrophili, and the feet Natatorii; but it is not found in the water. It has been caught upon a sheet of white paper flying over a hot-bed in the spring: it is about the size of a mite (Acanus siro), and the punctuation of the elytra cannot be distinguished by the naked eye: it is many degrees less than the Staphylinus Boleti, which is placed by Linné “ inter minima insecta.”

The other classes of insects will not so long detain us.

HEMIPTERA.

Gryllus bipunctatus. Sys. Natur. 693.

The small Spring Locust, covered by the long scutellum instead of wings: found about Belvoir Castle.

Gryllus verrucivorus.

The large Grasshopper with sword-form tail. About Stathern, Muston, and other places. It frequents hedges where hops grow.

Many species of Grylli, Cicadæ, and Cimices, fly in the gardens and plantations about Belvoir Castle.

Cicada. Sys. Natur. 704.

The Cicada spumaria is a small insect found in gardens, &c. involved in the frothy spume which proceeds from it. Of these insects it is difficult to number, much less describe the species, they are so nearly resembling each other: twelve varieties, or perhaps species, are found here, of which no discriminating character can be given.

Cicada bifasciata. A small neat species found in the Vale about Harby.

Notonecta. Sys. Natur. 712. The Boatfly.

The Notonecta glauca, the third variety of Scopoli, in his Entomologia carniolica, p. 119, is here very common; while the first or common Boatfly of Linné is seldom found.

Notonecta striata: many varieties in pools about Harby and Stathern.

Nepa. Sys. Natur. 713. Water Scopion. Ponds about Belvoir.

Cimex. The Bug.

The species of this genus fly in the wood opposite Barston and about Belvoir in great varieties, among which are several new ones; the Cimex linearis is seldom found except in a few ponds about Muston.

The Aphides, Chermes, and Cocci, are found in every part of the Vale in great variety.

The LEPIDOPTERA, or Butterflies and Moths, succeed these in the Linnean System; and no class has so much engaged the attention of the Entomologist: their number, beauty, and variety, are surprizing. Harris, in his English Aurelian, enumerates four hundred and fifteen: whether so many fly in the Vale of Belvoir is not easy to tell; but certainly many are there which he has not described; so that the whole number in the kingdom is much larger than in his work. The Phalæna alone have afforded Fabricius eleven hundred and eighty-nine species in his Mantissa Insectorum, 1787; and of these, especially the smaller kind, Geometræ, Pyralides, and Tiniæ, most are European insects, and a great number English. This is not the case with his Papiliones: of eight hundred and thirty-four Butterflies, not one fourth part are European; and only about fifty inhabit this kingdom, of which the greater part are found in and about the woods which reach from Stathern to Belvoir Castle, and the plantations about that mansion.

The Sphinges, called the Hawk, Elephant, and Humble-bee Moths, are more rare, but fly in Belvoir Gardens. The Filipendulæ and Stellatarum are common.

NEUROPTERA, or insects with nerved wings, form the next class, the number of which is comparatively small: a beautiful variety of the Libellula Virgo flies about the rivulets of this country, viz. “ Libellula Corpore viridi-cœruleo nitido, alis medio cœrulescentibus; basi et apice albis, margine immaculato,” Geoffry Insect. et Fabricii Syst. p. 425: with several other varieties of the Virgo and Puella.

Ephemera. Sys. Natur. 906. The May-fly. Day-fly. These insects, after living for the space of three years in their larva-state in the water, are said to finish the remainder of their life (their perfect or winged state) in one day. “ Volatiles factæ,” says Linné, “ brevissimo fruuntur gaudio, uno sæpe eodemque die, nuptias, puerperia, et exsequias celebrantes.” This, however, must not be understood quite literally: an Ephemera, which has not deposited its eggs, will live five or six days; and almost every one, two or three: the Striata and Diptera often survive a week: theirs is notwithstanding, in all probability, the shortest life of any winged insect of equal size.

Phryganea. The larva of these insects are called Case-worms, and are found abundantly in pools and ditches: they are a common bait for angling. Linné says, Swallows skim the pools for them: the species of this insect are here met with in great abundance.

Hemerobius perla. Sys. Nat. 910. A beautiful green four-winged insect with golden eyes, together with three other of the same genus, are caught in Stathern and Barston wood.

Raphidia ophiopsis. Sys. Nat. 916. A singular and scarce insect, haunts the bark of old oaks in the above woods: it is easily distinguished by the length and figure of its thorax, which is slender and cylindrical.

HYMENOPTERA, is a class of insects which have four wings, all membranaceous, and are furnished with a sting.

Ichneumon. A small insect resembling a slender Wasp.

The species of this genus are here, as indeed in almost every part of the kingdom, very numerous: these are the insects which deposit their eggs upon the larva of the Butterfly and Moth, where they are hatched, and the young sustained at the peril of the foster-parent, which commonly dies just upon its change into a chrysalis or pupa. Older Entomologists, not aware of this circumstance, supposed

supposed one kind of larva produced those very different insects, the Ichneumon and Phalæna. Goedart, finding this of the larva of the Phalæna antiqua, says, "Eruca mirificè propagans sobolem dicta mihi miranda, quandoquidem vel papilionem vel musicam gignit."

Chrysis. The Golden Wasp. Sys. Nat. 947.
One species of this genus, the Ignita, with a green thorax and golden abdomen, is very common. A very small, but equally beautiful species, not described (or not accurately), flies about the church and old walls of Stathern.

Vespa crabro. The Hornet. Great numbers in Barston wood.

Vespa rufa. At Stathern, or one nearly resembling it.

Apis. The Bee.
About twenty-four species may be caught in the woods below Belvoir-Hill, and the gardens and plantations about the Castle.

Formica. The Ant.
Formica Herculeana, rufa, fusea, nigra, rubra and cæsyitum, all occur about or near Belvoir. They are called,

1. The large Horse Ant.
2. The middle sized reddish Ant. Common Ant.
3. The pale brown Ant. Shining Ant.
4. The small black Ant.
5. The very small red Ant. In grass.
6. The Moss Ant, with two knots between the thorax and abdomen.

Mutilla formicaria; or rather, Ichneumon apterus. In Barston wood.

DIPTERA. Sys. Nat. p. 969.
Dipterous Insects are more particularly called Flies; of these Linné enumerates ten genera.

Œstrus. The Breese or Gadfly. Butler means this genus when he says,

"The Learned write, an Insect Breese
"Is but a mongrel prince of bees
"That falls before a storm on Cows,
"And stings the founders of his house,
"From whose corrupted flesh that Breed
"Of vermin did at first proceed."
Hudibras, Part III. Canto, II. l. 1.

They deposit their eggs in the ears, fauces, anus, and back of cattle, and are found over the whole kingdom; but the Œstrus Bovis is not very common in this part of it.

Tipula. Sys. Nat. 670.
A very common and numerous tribe of insects, found in every part of the Vale; one large and handsome species of which is not described by any author: it is of the size of the Tipula rivosa; but the wings are immaculate, and of a pale brown-gold colour; it is very scarce, but haunts a few places about Stathern in July and August.

Tipula pectinicornis breeds in rotten trees, but is not very common.

Musca. The Fly commonly so called.
Many species undescribed, and perhaps indiscriminate, will here occur to the Entomologist.

Tabanus. Sys. Natur. 1000.
The species Bovinus, Autumnalis, Pluvialis, and Cæcutiens, frequent the Vale, and are distinguished as most of this genus by their fasciated or punctuated eyes. The Bovinus is not very common.

Culex. The Gnat.
Culex ciliaris. Linné. Stathern, Harby, &c.
Culex annulatus. Mantissa Insectorum Fabricii, Tom. II. 363. At Muston.

Conops and Asilus. Various species in the woods about Belvoir.

Bombylius medius. Sparingly under the Hill.

Hippobosca ovina.
An insect which is an exception to this class, (having no wings, but otherwise agreeing with the winged Hippobosca), is very common upon the back of sheep, adhering most tenaciously to the wool by its numerous small and acute claws.

APTERA. Insects without wings.
These are Lepismæ, Poduræ, Pediculi, Pulices, with each 6 feet.
Acari, Phalangii, Araneæ, each 8 feet.
Monoculi, onisci, each about 14 feet.
Scolopendræ and Juli, each many feet. One Julus, 240.
Nothing particular need be mentioned of these genera: the same species which are found in other counties will be met with here; but they are so imperfectly described, that it is very difficult, in many cases, to say if they be the individuals meant by authors or not.

VERMES. Syst. Nat. 1069.
Under this title Linné comprehends the following animals:

1. The Intestina, or Worms, properly so called, and Leeches.
2. Mollusca, certain marine animals of a soft, gelatinous nature, having arms or tentacles.
3. Testacea, Mollusca covered with shells. Vulgò shell-fish.
4. Lithophyta. Compound animals with calcareous habitations. Vulgò, Corals.

To which are appendaged,
Zoophyta. Compound animals, as it were, flowering (efflorescent) from a vegetable stem.

It will be immediately seen, that a very small number of these can be inhabitants of an inland country, where even fresh water is not very plentiful: each division, however, (except the Lythophyta) affords a few specimens.

Among the INTESTINA are,

Gordius aquaticus and argillaceus. In clay and waters above a clay soil, like a horse-hair; and vulgarly supposed to be actually hair animated.
Fasciola intestinalis. In the intestines of roach, &c.
Hirudo geometra. About Goadby in streams, and in the Devon.

Among the MOLLUSCA is only one genus.
Limax ater. In woods.
—— maximus. About Belvoir gardens.
—— hyalinus. In plants and mosses, pellucid, with four or five other species or varieties.

TESTACEA. Sys. Nat. 1100.
Land or fresh water shells are little prized by many collectors of natural curiosities; they have indeed little beauty, and their varieties are few; they are also brittle, many of them breaking with the slightest force, and are reckoned too common to merit attention: yet they are links in the great chain of being; many of them are curious, as affording a knowledge of their modes of life, which could not be obtained from Marine Mollusca; and, at least, one species in our fresh waters is scarce and curious.

BIVALVES.

Mya pictorum. Sys. Nat. 1112. In the Devon plentifully.
Tellina cornea. In ponds and ditches.
Mytilus anatinus. In the Devon and other streams.
Mytilus cygneus. Not immediately in the Vale, but lower down the Devon near its junction with the Trent.

UNIVALVES.

Nautilus.
The recent species of Nautilus, or Cornu Ammonis, hitherto found, are few and minute: those described by Linné are sea-shells; but Mr. Lightfoott, author of the Flora Scotica, found a small species in fresh water. There is one of this genus, and perhaps the same Mr. Lightfoot mentions, below Belvoir Castle, on the left hand in the way to Redmile, in a pool where the bur-reed grows.

Turbo bidens. Sys. Nat. 1240. In woods about Belvoir.

Turbo perversus. In moss and old trees.
These two shells are remarked for the turning of the volutions in a different direction from the common Univalves; anfractibus contrariis.

Helix. The Snail.—viz.
Planorbis. In ponds, and river Devon.
Vortex. In ponds, not common.
Albella. Ant-hills and hedges.
Hortensis. Garden Snail.
Arbustorum. About Belvoir.
Vivipara. Ditches.
Zonaria. Ribband Snail, very common.
Stagnalis. Very large specimens at Goadby.
Putris. Ponds.
Auricularia and Tentacularia. Ponds.
Several varieties of these Snails, particularly the Zonaria, are found about Belvoir Castle.

The LYTHOPHYTA are all marine animals.

Zoophyta.

Spongia fluviatilis. A fragile, fetid, subramose Spunge, is found in a small rivulet about Bingham.

Spongia lacustris. Creeping, flat, fetid Spunge, plentiful in a little stream under the Bridge, and sparingly in the Devon about Croxton.

Tubularia campanulata. Monsieur Tremley's Polypus. See Adams on the Microscope, &c.
Upon duck-weed and the byssus in several ponds about Stathern.

Vorticella. Sys. Nat. 1318.
There are in several pools and ditches throughout the Vale of Belvoir many kinds of Vorticella, some answering to the brief descriptions of Linné, others varying from them. It is difficult to state the kinds or numbers; but the lover of microscopical researches need not fear a want of objects for his amusement.

Hydra. The above observation applies also to this genus.

Volvox Globater. A common microscopical animalcule.

Chaos. Lin. Sys. 1326.
Under this name Linné has comprehended all those animalcula of indeterminate or changeable figure, found in vinegar, paste, water, and various infusions of grain, hay, and herbs; they can scarcely claim a place in local history; and it will be sufficient to observe, that they may be procured in the neighbourhood (as perhaps in all other places) in great variety and abundance.

VEGETABLES.

MONANDRIA.

Hippuris vulgaris. Mare's Tail. In the Devon.

DIANDRIA.

Veronica Chamœdrys. Wild Germander. Knipton Pastures, Muston Gorse.

Pingucula vulgaris. Butterwort.
In low and boggy ground about Knipton by the sides of the Devon, but sparingly.

Circœa lutetiana. Enchanters Nightshade. In Stathern wood.

TRIANDRIA.

Valeriana officinalis. Wild Valerian.
Under the hill at Goadby, Piper's Hole, Devon side.

Iris fœtidissima. Stinking Iris.
In a farm-yard at Stathern near the Church; by the common pasture-gate at Eastwell.

Nardus stricta. Mat-Grass.
In Knipton Pasture, and about Belvoir.

Sanguisorba officinalis. Burnet Saxafrage.
In several meadows between Muston and Bottesford: probably at first culvitated, but it is now in no great esteem.

Alchemilla vulgaris. Ladies Mantle. About Stathern.

Sagina erecta. Upright Pearlwort.
Upon the declivity of Belvoir Hill, about the Warren.

PENTANDRIA.

Lithospermum officinale. Gromwell.
At Muston, in the road from the Church towards Grantham.

Symphytum officinale. Comfrey. Muston, by the Devon.

Menyanthes trifoliata. Buckbean.
Between Stathern Town and the wood—Knipton.

Lysimachia nummularia. Creeping Moneywort.
By ditches and moist banks, at Langar, Coulston Bassett, &c.

——— tenella. Purple Moneywort, or Pimpernel.
By Devon side at Knipton.

Verbascum nigrum. Black Mullein. At Stanton.

Vinca minor. Lesser Periwinkle. At Muston.

—— major. Greater Periwinkle.
At Woolsthorpe on several walls in the street.

Datura Stramonium. Thorny Apple.
In several meadows about Belvoir Castle, but probably from seed which originated in the gardens.

Solanum dulcamara. Woody Nightshade.
Common about watery places. When this plant lies in the water, as it frequently does, radical fibres in great numbers will issue from the stem to the length of many yards, all which take root in the ground when the water dries away; hence the extreme difficulty of eradicating the plant.

Campanula glomerata. Lesser Canterbury Bells.
About Stathern Hill side; more plentiful at Harston and Woolsthorpe.

——— hybrida. Corn Bell Flower. Sparingly at Woolsthorpe.

Rhamnus Catharticus. Purging Buckthorn.
In Muston Gorse. but not common.

——— frangula. Berry-bearing Alder.
At Woolsthorpe, Knipton, Stathern.

Ribes rubrum. Small Red Currants.
Among the plantations about Belvoir; the fruit about half the common size, pleasant, but very acid.

Gentiana Amorella. Autumnal Gentian.
In the pastures between Stathern and Plungar.

Sanicula Europœa. Common Sanicle. At Croxton.

Sison amomum. Field Honey-wort, or Amomum.
At Stathern by the sides of the Southern inclosures; the seed warm and aromatic.

Bunium Bulbocastanum. Kipper-nut. Earth-nut.
In great plenty in most parts of the Vale.

Phellandrium aquaticum. Water Hemlock.
In the Devon, about Bottesford and Stanton.

Scandix odorata. Sweet Cicely.
About Belvoir; but it may be suspected to have sprung from the gardens.

Pastinaca sylvestris. Wild Parsnip.
Plentifully at Stathern; the root six inches long, and very sweet.

Smyrnium olusatrum. Alexanders.
In the Nottinghamshire part of the Vale, about Bingham, &c. This plant is cultivated as Celery; but the seed will often lie in the ground two and three years before it vegetates.

Pimpinella major. Greater Pimpinell.
In the Southern part of the Vale below and about Piper's Hole, Claxton, &c.

Ægopodium Podagraria. Goutweed, &c. In gardens at Stathern, &c.

Vibernum Lantana. Mealy-tree. Stathern.

——— Opulus. Water Elder. Barston wood.

Sambucus Ebulus. Dwarf Elder. Belvoir Castle stables.

Parnassia palustris. Grass of Parnassus.

In all the tufty pastures and bogs by the Devon side.

Linum usitatissimum. Flax.

Among Corn at Muston, Woolsthorpe, Eastwell, &c.

——— catharticum. Purging Flax. In meadows, &c.

HEXANDRIA.

Acorus calamus. Sweet Cane. Calamus aromaticus.

Not a native of the Vale, but planted in the Devon at Muston, where, as it increases, it will be esteemed indigenous. This observation applies to many plants in the kingdom, and particularly several scarce ones about Oxford, where former Botanists have placed them.

Juncus bulbosus. Bulbose Rush. Muston. Bottesford.

OCTANDRIA.

Epilobium tetragonum. Square Willow Herb.

Sides of springs about Knipton.

Daphne Laureola. Spurge Laurel.

Stathern Wood. Muston Gorse. About Langar.

Polygonum amphibium. Amphibious Persicaria.

In and near the watery places about Plungar and Barston.

——— hydropiper. Water Pepper. Arsmart.

About Muston in ponds.

DECANDRIA.

Saxifraga tridactylites. Rue-leaved Saxafrage.

On thatch, walls, and old buildings.

——— granulata. White Saxafrage. About Belvoir.

Saponaria officinalis. Sopewort.

In the hedges of Harby about the town.

Silene nutans. Nottingham Catchfly.

In and about Nottingham, especially the Castle, this plant grows in great abundance. It is now at Stathern from seed scattered there.

Stellaria gramminea. α. β. γ. Hudson's Flora.

All these varieties in the hedges or turfly pastures.

Arenaria trinervia. Plantain-leaved Sandwort.

On the hills where the plantations are round Belvoir Castle.

——— rubra and β. media. Spurry. In ploughed fields.

Oxalis acetosella. Wood Sorrel. Croxton Park.

Cerastium semidecandrium. Least Mouse-ear Chickweed.

In old walls and dry places about Stathern.

——— arvense. Corn Mouse-ear Chickweed. At Woolsthorpe.

——— aquaticum. Water Mouse-ear Chickweed. By the Devon. In hedges about Muston.

Spergula arvensis.

——— pentandria. Corn Spurry.

Both in the lighter grounds in the Vale.

ICOSANDRIA.

Prunus Padus. Bird's Cherry. In Belvoir Plantations.

Spirea filipendula. Common Dropwort.

About Knipton, Waltham on the Wolds, &c.

Rosa villosa. Apple Rose. Stathern.

Rubus idæus. Raspberry.

About Belvoir in the deepest part of the Wilderness.

Rubus cæsius. Dewberry.

In great quantity about Coulston-Basset.

Fragaria vesca. Strawberry. About Belvoir,

——— sterilis. In Stathern Wood.

Potentilla repens. β. Hudson's Flora. Large Cinquefoil.

At Stathern in the pasture below the Hill.

POLYANDRIA.

Tilia Europœa. Lime Tree. About Belvoir, &c.

Cistus Helianthemum. Little Sun-flower.

On the banks about Croxton.

Nymphœa lutea. Yellow Water Lily. In the Devon about Stanton.

Anemone lutea. Wood Anemone.

At Piper's Hole. In Croxton Park.

Ranunculus flammula. Spear Crowfoot.

——— lingua. Small Spear.

——— repens. Creeping.

——— bulbosus. Bulbous.

——— acris. Upright.

——— sceleratus. Marsh.

——— auricomus. Wood.

——— parviflorus. Small-flowered.

——— arvensis. Corn.

——— hederaceus. Ivy-leaved. And ——— aquaticus. Water Crowfoot.

These are all the species of Rananculus mentioned by English Botanists. They are all found in the Vale of Belvoir, in more or less plenty. The parviflorus on dray walls at Muston; the flammula in the Devon.

Ficaria. Hudson. Ranunculus Ficaria. Linné. Pilewort.

Common in the Vale.

DIDYNAMIA.

Gynospermia.

Nepeta cataria. Cat Mint.

About Muston, in the way to Bennington Grange.

Mentha aquatica. Water. In Ditches.

——— hirsuta. Hairy. By hedge-sides.

——— rubra. Red. Stathern, &c.

——— arvensis. Corn Mint. In ploughed fields.

——— pulegium. Pennyroyal. Scarce.

Betonica officinalis. Wood Betony. Belvoir and Woolsthorpe.

Ballota alba. White Ballote.

A variety of the Black. It grows in Stathern, and sparingly at Muston.

Leonurus cardiaca. Motherwort.

Not a native of the Vale, but now about Stathern from seed brought from Cove, near Beccles, in Suffolk.

Clinopodium vulgare. Wild Basil. On the Hill above Barston Wood.

Prunella vulgaris, flore rubro. Sef-heal with a red flower.

Hill above Harby.

Angiospermia.

Antirrhinum elatine. Sharp-pointed Toad-flax.

——— spurium. Round-leaved Toad-flax.

Both between Bottesford and Muston, in corn-fields.

Scrophularia modosa. Figwort. In hedges about Croxton.

——— aquatica. Water Betony. Muston, &c,

Tetradynamia.

Lepidium latifolium. Broad-leaved Pepperwort.

At Muston, brought from Aldborough in Suffolk.

Thlaspi campestre. Mithridate Mustard.

Above Harby. At Piper's Hole. Goadby.

——— arvense. Broad-pod Treacle Mustard.

At Stathern. Seeds from Skillington.

Cochlearia coronopus. Swine's Scurvygrass. In path-ways and yards.

Erysimum barbarea. Winter Cresse.
Flore pleno at Muston.

Arabis thaliana. Wall Cresse. Sandy banks in the spring.

Sysimbrium amphibium. α.
β. aquaticum.
γ. terrestre.
Varieties of Water Radish. At Langar.

Sinapis nigra. Black or common Mustard.
——— alba. White.
——— arvensis. Wild or Charlock.
All these in the corn-fields of the Vale.

MONODELPHIA.

Geranium cicutarium. Hemlock Cranesbill.
——— moschatum. Musk Cranesbill.
——— pratense. Meadow Cranesbill.
——— molle. α. and β. Common soft Cranesbill.
——— lucidum. Shining Cranesbill.
——— dissectum. Jagged Cranesbill.
——— robertianum. Stinking Cranesbill.
——— β. Saxatile.
The two first species are scarce in the Vale; the fifth was brought from Matlock, and is scattered about Stathern; the variety β. of the robertianum from Orford Beach, in Suffolk.

Malva alcea. Vervain Mallow. Harby, Belvoir, &c.

DIADELPHIA.

Polygala vulgaris. Milkwort.
Three varieties, blue, red, and white, are here common.

Spartium scoparium. Broom. About Claxton, but very scarce.

Genista anglica. Pettywhin. Sparingly about Goadby.

Anthyllus vulneraria. Kidney Vetch.
At Knipton, Muston, Allington, &c.

Orobus tuberosus. Heath pea.
In the pastures about Claxton and Goadby.

Lathyrus Nyssolia. Crimson Grass Vetch.
Plentifully in a little meadow at Muston in the way to Bottesford: very sparingly in any other place.

Ervum tetraspermum. Smooth Tare.
——— hirsutum. Hairy Tale.
Both common at Muston, Bottesford, &c.

Ornithopus perpusillus. Birdsfoot.
Scarce, in the dry hills about Croxton.

Hedysarum onobrychis. Saintfoin.
At Muston, in a meadow called Saintfoin.

Astragulus glycyphyllos. Wild Liquorice. At Piper's Hole, sparingly.

Trifolium melilotus. Melitot Trefoil. Common.
——— repens. White Clover. In Meadows, &c.
——— pratense. Purple Honeysuckle. Perennial.
——— γ. Larger annual or biennial.
——— arvense. Hare's Foot. At Bottesford.
——— striatum. Knotted. At Bottesford.
——— subterraneum. Dwarf. Now at Muston.
Brought from Bury in Suffolk.
——— fragiferum. Strawberry. In wet pastures.
——— agrarium. Great Hop Trefoil. } In pastures.
——— procumbens. Small Hop. }

Lotus corniculatus. var. γ. Large-flowered Lotus.
In the boggy parts of the river Devon, and about Harston.

Medicago polymorpha. Heart Medick. Snail Trefoil.
Now at Muston, brought from the banks of the Cam.

POLYADELPHIA.

Hypericum humifusum. Trailing St. John's Wort.
Very sparingly about Woolsthorpe by the river.
——— perforatum. Common St. John's Wort.
——— hirsutum. Hairy.
——— quadrangulum. St. Peter's Wort.
The three last upon the hill above Harby, Stathern, &c.

SYNGENESIA.

Tragopogon pratense. Yellow Goatsbeard. In Pastures.

Lactuca virosa. Stinking Lettuce. Barston Wood.

Picris echioides. Rough Picris. Bottesford, Muston.

Serratula tinctorea. Sawwort. In Stathern and Harby Pastures.

Carduus heterophyllus. Gentle Thistle. At Knipton, in the bogs.
——— eriophorum. Globe Thistle.
About Belvoir, and all the way to Stathern, &c.
——— acaulis. Dwarf Thistle.
At Croxton in the way to Skillington.

Carlina vulgaris. Wild Carline.
About Belvoir Hill and the pastures below.

Bidens tripartita. Trifid Hemp Agrimony.
In the road from Belvoir Castle to Croxton. At Muston.

Tanacetum vulgare. Tansy.

Gnaphalium dioicum. Mountain Cudweed.
In the road from Croxton to Skillington, with a beautiful pale red flower.
——— sylvaticum. Upright Cudweed.
In a hedge near Waltham, one mile from the town on the left hand going to Grantham.
——— uliginosum. Marsh Cudweed.
Common in all the Vale.

Erigeron acre. Blue Erigeron.
Sparingly beyond Langar in the road to Nottingham.

Tussilago Petasites. Great Colt's-foot, or Butterbur.
——— hybrida. Stalked Colt's foot, or Butterbur.
The first of these plants is very common in most parts of this kingdom; the latter is very scarce, and is particularly sought for in this county; it grows with the first species along the banks of the Devon; and most plentifully at Knipton and Muston. They can only be distinguished when in flower: the latter is then often more than two feet high; the former eight or nine inches; they have besides the specific distinction mentioned by Botanists.

Aster Tripolium. Sea Starwort.
This plant, as may be gathered from its name, cannot be a native of the Vale of Belvoir: it has been brought from the Coast of Suffolk, and planted there, where, though the soil is very different, it flourishes much, and flowers about November[1], a little later than the common Asters of the garden.

Inula helenium. Elecampane.
About the Devon side, but probably planted there.
——— pulicaria. Lesser Elecampane.
Scattered about Muston from seed brought from Gillingham, near Beccles, in Suffolk.

Achillea ptarmica. Sneeze-wort Yarrow.
In and about Goadby and Eastwell.

Viola tricolor. Pansy Violet, or Heart's-ease.
A very large variety, like that cultivated in gardens, is found in some enclosures at Woolsthorpe.

---

[1] Botanists carry seeds and plants from one country and soil to another; some for fun (as Dr. Lort threw a Roman coin at top of Stonehenge). Hence the propriety of making an early Flora. Hence it is that former Botanists are not blameable for not mentioning plants that may be common by and by. G. A.

GYNANDRIA.

GYNANDRIA.

Orchis pyramidalis. Pyramidal Orchis.
At Wolsthorpe, by the river Devon, sparingly.

—— mascula. Male Orchis.
In Stathern Wood. Piper's Hole.

—— morio. Female Orchis. Common in pastures. Either of these Orchis may be used in making Salep.

—— ustulata. Dwarf Orchis.
Very scarce, but found beyond Bingham by the Trent side.

—— latifolia. Broad-leaved Orchis.
—— maculata. Spotted Orchis.
These two common in moist meadows.

—— conopsea. Sweet or Musk Orchis.
Scarce, but found about Goadby and Eastwell.

Ophrys ovata. Twayblade.
In Belvoir Plantations next Woolsthorpe.

Serapias latifolia. Helleborine.
In a plantation below Belvoir Castle.

MONOECIA.

Zannichellia palustris. In pools about Stathern, &c.

Chara vulgaris. Common Chara. Ponds at Eastwell.

Lemna trisulca. Ivy-leaf duck's-meat. Ponds at Eastwell.

Typha angustifolia. Lesser Reed Mace.
In a pool beyond Barrowby in the road to Grantham.

Sparganium erectum. Great Burreed.
In the Devon at Bottesford and Stanton.

Carex Dioica. Male and Female Carex, or Cyperus Grass.

—— pulicaris. Flea. Both in Knipton by the Devon.

—— paniculata. In turfty places by the Devon.
—— flava. Yellow Carex at Woolsthorpe.
—— pilulifera. Round-head Carex. Woolsthorpe.
—— sylvatica. Wood Carex, in Stathern Wood.
—— acuta. Curtis, Flora Londinensis.
—— gracilis. Curtis.
These, with about twelve more species, are found in the Vale, principally about the Devon, at Knipton and Woolsthorpe.

Betula alba. Birch Tree. Not very common.

—— alnus. Alder.

Poterium sanguisorba. Burnet. Hills about Woolsthorpe.

Fagus Castanea. Chesnut. In Croxton Park.

Carpinus Betulus. Horn Beam.

DIOECIA.

Salix pentandria. Sweet shining Willow.
At Eastwell, along the Brook, but probably planted there.

Viscum album. White Missletoe.
On apple-trees, but not common.

Tamus communis. Black Briony.

Brionia alba. White Briony.
Both in hedges, but neither very frequent.

POLYGAMIA.

Callitriche vernalis. } Water Starwort.
β. autumnalis. }
In ditches about Langar, &c.

Valantia crutiata. Crosswort.
Piper's Hole. Hill above Barston Wood.

CRYPTOGAMIA.

Filices.

Asplenium scolopendrium. Harts-tongue.
A variety with laciniated leaves in the gardens at Belvoir Castle.

—— trichomanes. Maiden-hair.
Upon Stathern and other churches.

—— Ruta-muraria. Wall Rue. Muston Church, &c.

Acrostichum Thelypteris. Marsh Polypody. About Croxton Park.

Polypodium filix mas. Male Polypody.
filix femina. Female Polypody.
In Belvoir Plantations.

—— aculeatum. Prickly Polypody. About Granby.

MUSCI.

Phascum acaulon. Sides of moist hedges, Eastwell and Stathern.

Polytrichum nanum.
In the road from Croxton by the Park Wall.

Mnium palustre. In a bog at Knipton.

Bryum fontanum. Under Stathern Hill.

—— extinctorium. Extinguisher Moss.
On the wall near the entrance into Belvoir Castle.

—— Hygrometricum. By the Lime-kiln below Belvoir.

—— serpillifolium. Hudson, Flor. Ang. 492.
Several varieties in the gardens and plantations about Belvoir Castle.

Hypnum bryoides.
—— taxifolium.
—— adiantoides.
All in the moist plantations and hedge-sides about Woolsthorpe, &c.

—— parietinum. On the Hill between Belvoir and Stathern.

—— dendroides. In Knipton Wood by the Brook.

—— alocuperoides. Very large in Belvoir Plantations.

ALGÆ.

Jungermannia furcata. In the Plantations next the Warren at Belvoir.

Marchantia polymorpha.
In an old Lime-kiln below Belvoir Castle; it is the variety γ. of Hudson, and flowers yearly.

Lichen vernalis. Relhan, Flor. Cantabrigien. 423.
On the Park-wall at Croxton.
—— incanus. Relhan.
—— canescens. Dickson.
In walls and pales common.

—— muscorum. Relhan, 424, figure.
In the pastures of the Vale common.

—— flavo-rubens. On trunks of trees in Stathern Wood.

—— gelidus. On the Walls of Croxton Park.

—— parellus. Dyer's Lichen.
On the walls from Belvoir to Stathern.

—— excavatus. Relhan, 426. On dry hills in Harby Pastures.

—— subimbricatas. Relhan's figure, p. 427.
On Stathern Church and the walls in the Church-yard.

—— physodes. About Goadby Park, sparingly.

—— nigrescens. In Stathern Wood, but not frequent.

—— calicaris et farinacens. Relhan, 432.
In plantations about Belvoir.

—— capreatus. Stathern Wood; it seldom flowers there.

Lichenes scyphiferi.
Many varieties occur in the Vale of Belvoir; but they have the brown fructifications only; the scarlet kinds are very scarce.

Lichen hirtus.
In a plantation by the side of the Devon at Woolsthorpe.

Tremella Sabinæ. Dickson's Fasciculus.
This plant can scarcely be called a native of Great Britain, having yet been found only upon the Savin, which is a foreign shrub. It grows upon that in the greatest abundance at Muston, and appears principally in July and August.

Tremella auricula. Eared Tremella. Jew's Ears. In Elder in the Warren, between Belvoir and Stathern.

——— albida. Hudson, Flor. Ang. 565. In the Wood by the Devon's side at Woolsthorpe.

Byssus aurea. On the West walls of Belvoir Castle.

——— Jolithus. On a few quartzy stones in Belvoir Castle.

FUNGI.

AGARICS.

The Agarics are so numerous a genus of Fungi, and so liable to confusion through want of a proper specific knowledge, that, even with the help of plates, it is difficult sometimes to tell precisely what an Author means. The Flora Cantabrigiensis of Relhan, Hudson's Flora Anglica, Lightfoot's Flora Scotica, and a late publication by Mr. Bolton of Halifax, all afford assistance in this difficult part of Botany; but there are many Agarics in the Vale of Belvoir, and about the woods of Stathern and Barston, which are undescribed, though they can no more pass for varieties of any species hitherto defined, than any two of those species can be deemed varieties of each other. In this confusion, it will be sufficient to point out the great variety of these Fungi here met wit, without entering into particulars.

Boletus ignirarius. Touchwood.
——— coriaceus. Leathery Boletus.
——— hepaticus. Liver Boletus.
——— squammosus. Scaly Boletus.
——— versicolor. Striped Boletus.
——— bovinus. Brown and
——— luteus. Yellow Boletus.
All these are common in the woods and plantations.

——— elegans. Bolton's Fungi, Vol. II. 74. Sometimes found on apple-trees. Muston.

——— albus. In Stathern Wood, but scarce.

——— nummularius. On rotten wood in pastures about Belvoir.

Phallus impudicus.
In many of the plantations about Belvoir. At Denton.

Hydnum auriscalpum.
In the plantation of firs and oaks next the Castle.

Helvella clavata. Dickson, Fascic.
This curious species grows in the gardens below Belvoir Castle. A person who resided there entered it in his note-book several years since by the name of Helvella gelatinosa. It is a yellow subgelatinous Fungus, with a cap, but no lamella. Several grow together among rotten leaves and the perishing plants in September and October.

Peziza lentifera. On the ploughed land at Harby.

——— punctata. On horse-dung. Belvoir Hill.

——— scutellata.
On rotten wood in moist places. Eastwell.

——— gracilis. A new species.
The stalk is an inch high, and very slender; the cup about the size of half a pea hollowed; the colour brown, and the surface smooth, both within and without.

It grows in the small plantation on the right hand in going from Belvoir Castle to Blackberry-hill. Found in September.

——— cochleata. In Stathern Wood.

Clavaria ceralloides. Large Coral Clavaria.

——— fastigiata. Small Coral Clavaria.
These two Fungi are common; the first in the woods here; the second in the pastures; but, besides these, is a Clavaria on the hills, which cannot be called a variety of either. It is yellow, two inches high, the clubs issue from one root, but no where join above, nor are branched. Sometimes 30 grow together. It is not perhaps yet either figured or described.

Lycoperdon Bovista. Very large. In meadows, &c.
——— β. echinatum. Woods at Belvoir.
——— η. excipuliforme. In pastures.
——— epidendrum. On decayed stumps of trees.

Sphæria fraxinea. Relhan, Supplement, 34.
——— maxima.
Both in Stathern Wood.

——— fragiforme. Dickson.
On the decayed sticks from Yews.

——— mammiformis. Relhan, 472.
On willows at Stathern.

FOSSILS.

These may be considered as native or extraneous. Native Fossils are Earths, Salts, Metals, and Inflammables. Earths are calcareous, barytic, muriatic, argillaceous, and siliceous.

CALCAREOUS FOSSILS are the most numerous in the Vale of Belvoir; but native Calx has not been found there.

Spar is one of the most common of mineral bodies; it has not many varieties in this country: the principal are,

1. Masses of small crystalized pyramids without a column, upon limestone.
2. Small plated Spar, in the cavities of Anomia.
3. Small crystalized; in those and other petrifactions.
4. Common irregular debased Spar, every where with limestone.
5. Stalactical Spar, crumbly and light, from the arches in the entrance into Belvoir Castle.
6. Dull and soft Osteocolla, in a spring which run South of Stathern.
   It is pipy.
7. White opaque Spar, in small pieces scattered in various places, like Gypsum, and even striated as some varieties of that fossil.

Chalk is not found very pure in any part of the Vale; nodules at Stathern are white and fine, but are debased with a portion of Argill; not so much, however, as to render them marle.

Limestone, in various degrees of purity, over the whole Vale; pure, and without extraneous parts, at Croxton upon the Hill; grey, in small masses, with Statagmitæ, at Stathern; blue and hard in pieces intimately united with common building-stone; brown and coarse, with small Entrochi, at Croxton; and over the whole country with various extraneous bodies.

Marble, except in small pieces, scattered about the roads and ploughed land, is not discovered.

Gypsum is dug in several places in the Nottinghamshire part of the Vale, and masses are found in every part. The varieties are,

1. Common white striated.
2. White scaly.
3. Pale-red flaky.
4. Spar-like Gypsum, the Glaciale of Linné, in a peculiar kind of fossile Ammonite, found at Muston brick-kiln.

Selenite.
Ten-sided Selenite is found at Stathern in blue calcareous marle.

CALCAREOUS EARTH WITH CLAY; i. e. Marle of the calcareous kind; several varieties of this:

1. Fine, blue, soft, and unctuous, at Stathern.
2. Fine, hard, blue and stony, at Easthorpe, &c.
3. Margodes, with conchoidal fractures in nodules in clay, at Stathern.
4. Micaceous marle, at Stathern.
5. Slaty black marle, at Langar.

Almost all the clay in the country has a calcareous part; the dark clay much, but not sufficient to rank it in this genus.

Calcareous Iron Stones in small nodules are sometimes met with.

Barytes is not found here, except in some petrifactions, which, from their specific gravity, may be supposed to contain it; but they have not been sufficiently analyzed to determine their contents.

Muriatic Earths are not found.

Argillaceous Earths are not plentiful.

Pure clays are very scarce; but there are several varieties of the common kind, which contain much Silex, and some calcareous parts.

Coarse kinds of the Ludus Helmontii occur in several places.

Bole, of an indurated yellow kind, is found about Scalford, and in the road to Melton Mowbray; and a fine dusty calcareous red kind often lies in the cavities of the stony yellow, which is not calcareous.

Mica is only found in the masses of granite (which themselves are not often met with) and in the Micaceous marle above mentioned.

Granite, composed chiefly of Mica and Quartz, is found in small pieces of a black kind about Stathern and Harby.

Silicious Stones are in few varieties.

Flint, in small pieces over the ploughed grounds, &c.

Single or Shingel, small fragments of worn quartz, about Knipton, in the gravel.

Jasper, of a dull kind, with red specks at Stathern, and a browner at Knipton.

Dendroides are found sometimes on the coarser silicious stones, but no fine ones.

They occur also on the calcareous.

Feltspar is only in granite.

Silicious Iron Stones are in small masses in the pits.

Sand Stone.

The building-stone of the Vale is principally taken from pits near Belvoir Castle; it is also dug in several places in the Vale, for walls and for repairing the roads: it is not of one kind, but none of the kinds are very good. A coarse angular, but irregular grit, in an argillaceous cement, is common to them all, but with more or less calcareous parts; a soft stone near Croxton has no calx; but many kinds are nearly compounded of grit and calcareous earth, with a small portion of Argil.

Stone is dug at Belvoir, Muston, Easthorpe, Normanton, Bottesford, and Redmile; in which places occur most of the petrifactions mentioned in the following pages.

Saline substances are seldom found here; the only solid one is an Embryon Allum, found in small scales, like Mica, in lumps of brown clay: it lies about ten feet deep, in the barn-yard belonging to the rectory at Stathern.

Salts are said to impregnate a few waters in this neighbourhood; but no analyzation has been made which can be depended upon.

The saline efflorescence, on walls by stables, and places of that kind, occurs here as in other countries: it is formed by two, three, and sometime more species of salt.

Inflammables in the Vale of Belvoir are of two species, Coal and Pyrites.

Coal of a soft kind was discovered at Woolsthorpe, but in no great quantity; besides this, there is found at Normanton, in the blue limestone stratum, a bituminous body, resembling Cannal-coal, of a conchoidal fracture and singular appearance, intermixed with a coarse white spar, in such manner as to give the whole a tessellated form: this fossil seems to originate in the vegetable kingdom, and Mr. Mounsey has traced it till it actually terminates in a matter evidently ligneous; immediately above the sparry compartments of this substance, lies a calcareous coarse stone, with variety of fossil bodies.

Pyrites, of an irregular shape, called, by Wallerius, Pyrites, of botryoide form, were found in sinking a well at Barston; they are of a brilliant pale yellow; which, like all other of this species of mineral, grew dull when long exposed to the air.

Metal, whether in substance or ore, has not been found in the Vale of Belvoir, except in the iron stones, which contain that species, though probably in no great quantity.

Petrifactions, in great numbers, and of many kinds, are found over all this country, and more particularly in the North part of the Vale, about Bottesford, Easthorpe, Muston, and Normanton.

Of these, the Rev. Mr. Mounsey has in his possession the greatest variety, and is continually making additions to it. The following are the principal genera which he has hitherto found; but the limits of this work will not admit an account of the numerous species comprehended under them.

Petrificata, Linné, Systema Naturæ, vol. III. 157.

Amphibolithus.

1. Glossopetra sabulata, striata, called by Luid, in his Lithophylaceum Limaculum and Siliquastrum; it resembles a black polished horse-leech. Found at Easthorpe. It is of a metallic black, and highly polished like those found at Pyrton-passage, but is a scarce fossil.

It is not of the kind figured in the Plate of Fossils, inserted under Burbach, in vol. IV. Plate LXXIII. p. 463, fig. 11. which is the Glossopetra anceps.

Helmintholithus.

This genus affords almost all the petrified bodies we know; they follow in the order of Linné.

1. Hammonites, or Cornu Ammonis. See the Burbach Plate, fig. 7. 8. and 15. And fig. 22. is certainly of this genus.

Species.

1. With a smooth back and obtuse.
2. With a furrowed back, the furrows equal.
3. With a furrowed back, the furrows bifid.
4. With an acute whole back, and flat disk.
5. With one furrow at the back, and the disk with ridges alternately shorter.
6. With a prominent ridge between two furrows.

This last is the common Cornu Ammonis of the country; the numbers are very great, and the variation of size astonishing: Da Costa mentions a yard in diameter as the largest extreme; and the size of a pea as the smallest. Whether any here exceed the former dimension is not certain; but many are so minute as to require the help of a magnifier to distinguish their volutions; and being put into a scale, which will turn readily with a fourth part of a grain, or indeed with much less, they scarely cause that side of the beam to preponderate: between these dimensions others are found in every gradation.

2. Serpula.

Small pieces of stone with serpula are found at Easthorpe and Muston; it is yet hollow, and about the size of large thread, and some much larger.

3. Patella.

Fossile limpets are very scarce; Mr. Mounsey has met with a small specimen at Normanton.

4. Helix.

In petrifactions the genus Helix is not to be distinguished from the Turbo, nor even the Trochus, as the mouth is mostly abraded; some species, which nearly resemble the recent kind of an oblong form, are found at Easthorpe and Normanton.

5. Nerita.

It is very doubtful, if any of the numerous Univalves hitherto found in this country answer the definition of this genus.

6. Turbo. See the Burbach Plate, fig. 3.

A numerous genus. Mr. Mounsey has at least twenty species, with many variations: the Turbo terebra of Linné, and one like the Turbo acutangulus, are among those which most nearly resemble the recent kinds.

They are found in several pits, but chiefly at Normanton, Easthorpe, and Muston.

7. Trochus. See the Burbach Plate, fig. 18.

Three or four varieties are defined with a tolerable degree of certainty, and not unlike the recent kinds; these are from Easthorpe pits, and minute; but Trochi are found of larger kind, though not so perfect.

8. Buccinum.

A small species of this genus at Muston and Sedgbrook; it is smooth, not umbilicated, and with seven volutions.

9. Conus.

One species of the division Pyriformes. South of Muston.

10. Nautilus.

The fossile Nautilus is found in great varieties of size, but not of form; a petrifaction, called by Da Costa Ammonoides, is also met with about Normanton; they do not materially differ, except in the size of the first volution, from the common Cornu Ammonis: these have the beautiful foliaceous appearance of the fossile in the Burbach Plate, fig. 13.

11. Pinna.

Petrifactions of Pinna are very scarce; a specimen of one or two have been found at Easthorpe and Normanton, with longitudinal striæ, but no spines.

12. Mytilus. Burbach Plate, fig. 5.

A slender Muscle, about the length of the Mytius edulus, is common in the stone at Muston; and a larger and less slender resembling a Pholas; they are also found very small upon a slaty limestone about Bennington and other places.

13. Anomia.

This genus occurs in the greatest numbers. Burbach Plate, fig. 2. a. is one species.

The species Terebratula is common.

The Plicatella is generally filled with a fine foliated spar, and is equally plentiful.

The Angulata is nore scarce, and is filled with earth.

Many variations, and perhaps species, are found in the pits ahout Stathern.

14. Ostrea.

Pectens. Burbach Plate, fig. 12.

This division of Ostrea affords several beautiful specimens, particularly one at Bottesford; it is elegantly striated with striæ alternately less and greater; the colour is a polished black-blue.

Other varieties are,

Pectens, quite plain and smooth.
——— striated longitudinally.
——— striated transversely.
——— ridged with vaulted spines.
——— ridged with broad ridges.
——— striated deeply within the valve.
——— faintly radiated, with few rays, &c.

Ostrea, properly so called, have fewer variations, except in size: there are many of this kind.

Gryphites, Beaked Oysters, vulgarly called Crow Stones, are found in great plenty over the Vale; they differ but little in form or size; this petrifaction is a compact spar, scaly, and fetid when struck. In some specimens the upper small valve will fall by a blow, and the spar, where the animal lodged, from the under valve, leaving impressions on both sides where the ligaments tied it to the shell. See the Burbach plate, fig. 16. for the larger or lower valve.

Gryphites have been found of a flinty matter, but not in this country.

15. Arca

Three small species; one resembling the Arca nucleus of Pennant, found at Easthorpe.

16. Chama.

These are scarce. Mr. Mounsey has one specimen.

17. Spondylus.

Several, and very perfect; they resemble in form the Gæderopus, but are without spines. Easthorpe.

18. Venus.

There are some small, which are scarcely petrifactions; others large, and of a sparry matter, the hinge being perfect, and of this genus; these shells most resemble the Venus Erycina; but the smaller specimens only differ in size from the Venus Gallina.

19. Donax.

A petrifaction, resembling the Genus Donax in the obtuse margin, is found at Foston Field; but the hinge is not visible.

20. Cardium. Burbach Plate, fig. 4. a. and b. are probably of this genus.

It affords a few specimens, one like the Cardium edulis, but much less.

21. Tellina. Burbach Plate, fig. 2. b. a Tellin of the Cuneus kind.

The greatest variety of Bivalves is found in this genus, viz.

1. Those smooth and nearly equilateral.
2. Furrowed or striated.
3. a. The sides unequal, or Cunei.
3. b. The ridges of these latter very deep and transverse.
4. Two very deep dents beneath the hinge, as figured (but not accurately) in the Lithophylacium Luidii.
5. Oblong, with the hinge at one end, and several other varieties.

Casts of Fossile Cunei, plain and striated, entirely of stony matter, with no remains of shell, are found at Knipton Brook, and many other places; some resemble the figure No, 17. of Burbach Plate.

These are the petrifactions of the Testaceous kind, which are more certain; many remain, which require further investigation.

22. Madreporus.

The Porpita, or Button-stone of Dr. Plott, is a scarce fossil in this country, but is found at Easthorpe. See Burbach Plate, fig. 9. a. b.

A variety not mentioned by Authors occurs with it, where one side is more irregular, but undivided; and the lamina on the other side radiated two ways, but with their extremities terminating in the middle of the coral.

Another Madrepore of the fasciculated kind is found about the countay, but not immediately in the Vale; as at Harlaxton, in Lincolnshire, it is of a kind called Columella by some authors, but is fasciculated.

Minute specimens of Escharæ are discovered on pieces of limestone scattered about the Mill-hill at Stathern; it is precisely like the Eschara foliacea, but less.

Other small coral, or petrifactions of Zoophytes, are met with, which cannot readily be referred to any known genus.

23. Entrochus. Burbach Plate, fig. 10. c.

The Entrochi of this country are few: they are found in a coarse calcareous stone, and principally cipally at Croxton and Bottesford: they are small and smooth, and composed of a pure white opaque spar. At Bottesford they are mixed with the Asteria.

24. Asteria. See the Burbach Plate, fig. 10. a. and b.

25. Stella columnaris. Star Stones.

These are common at Knipton Brook and Bottesford; and found, but not so common, at other places in the Vale.

In the first, or Asteria, the Stella is more compound, and leaves a space in the centre: in the second, the points of the radii unite in the centre, and leave no space.

A variety, with only four radii, was found by Mr. Mounsey, but is very scarce.

26. Belemnites.

These conical fossils are in many places called thunder-stones: they are composed of a dense radiated fetid spar; they are found all over the Vale of various sizes, with or without a nucleus at the base.

PHYTOLITHUS Lithoxylon.

Petrified Wood is found at Easthorpe, Muston, and Sedgbrook, hard, spatose, and with evident fibrose texture: other specimens are crumbly and rotten.

2. Rhizolithus.

Petrified roots do not occur, unless the fibres mentioned under the article Sand-stone can be so denominated.

3. Carpolithus.

Resemblances of fruit, but of a very uncertain kind, are found at Easthorpe. Burbach Plate, fig. 6. is a Carpolithus, but not of the kind found here.

OSSA ANIMALIUM. Burbach Plate, fig. 19.

The bones found petrified in the pits at Bennington, Orston, and Easthorpe, can be referred to no certain kind, but are evidently osseous fossils, the external fibrose part and the central interstices plainly shewing their origin: they are probably different kinds of Vertebræ, nearly similar to those figured in Plate IX. of the Fossilia Hantoniensia.—A very large stone has been lately observed by Mr. Mounsey, which has the impressions of united vertebræ, with other separate bones, in considerable quantity; this stone lies under a post which supports a hovel, and cannot at present be particularly examined.

AN ACCOUNT of the STRATA of STONE and the FOSSIL BODIES found in the VALE of BELVOIR; accompanied with THREE PLATES of the more curious PETRIFACTIONS, engraved from SPECIMENS in the Possession of the Reverend WILLIAM MOUNSEY, by whom they were collected, arranged, and described.

THE term FOSSIL admits a considerable latitude of interpretation; it means any kind of bodies dug out of the earth, and in this sense it is used by Woodward, including every metallic and mineral substance; and we yet say a "Collection of Fossils," without excluding from our idea any other than animal and vegetable substances. Linné, in his System, published in 1768, makes of fossil bodies only one division of the mineral kingdom; Minerals, properly so called, being one, and Rocks and Fossils the other two; in this sense Fossils were petrifactions, of which he made eight Genera, with many Species.

Mr. Mounsey, in his account of the admirable collection he had formed, uses the word Fossil nearly in this sense of petrifactions, including, however, with Woodward, shells found with no other changes than such as arises from brittleness and loss of colour, and some other bodies which help to compose the various contents of lime-stone pits in the Vale of Belvoir.

Having premised thus much, it is not necessary to class and methodize our subject as those who treat of this part of Natural History in a more general or more scientific method. The Plates consist of petrified bodies alone; and respecting the pits where these are found, their strata and the stone which forms them, with some other particulars equally curious and satisfactory to the Mineralogist and the Collector of Fossils, the account which Mr. Mounsey has himself written and communicated, leaves nothing more to be desired on these heads. This indeed he presented as a series of remarks intended for the basis of a Treatise on the Fossiology of the Vale: but, having given to it our full consideration, we are perfectly assured that no other introduction to the description of the particular bodies is necessary; that any enlargement we could make would be superfluous; and that any corrections or alterations (except of a few and most trivial inaccuracies in a composition not immediately intended for the press) must be sought with much care, and made with little advantage.

OF THE STRATA OF THE EARTH, &C. CONTAINING FOSSIL SHELLS IN THE VALE OF BELVOIR.

In that part of the Vale of Belvoir which lies in this county, stone is dug for various purposes; in some places it is sought for the use of builders, in others it is burned to lime; but in most (and with respect to some portion of it, in all) it serves for the repair of the roads and village causeways, &c.

The strata which form these beds of stone, of whatever thickness they may be, as from an inch to a foot, are uniformly horizontal, and in no place appear to dip or follow the direction of the ground; but this uniformity extends no further than to the position of the strata. At the depth of 12 feet in some places are found seven or eight regular beds of stone; other places afford two or three beds; and in many places no bed is to be found. In one pit I observed 11 strata, of which more than one third part was useful stone; between each stratum was blue-clay bind or clunch, an hard marle containing more calcareous than argillaceous matter; but the contents of one of these pits gives no certain information respecting the formation of the strata of another, even at the most inconsiderable distance; we can therefore depend upon no observations which are not made from an inspection of the pit immediately under our examination; in a few yards the variation becomes great. Some strata gradually decrease in thickness, and run out, when other strata arise as these terminate; but though the pits be unlike with respect to their contents, yet it is to be remarked that the strata are stronger or weaker in proportion as they widen or approach each other. They are said to approach when a fresh stratum arises in the intermediate space, and to widen when one gradually runs out, for the distance then becomes doubled. Where the stone is firm and compact, the stratum of it terminates in an edge; where it is more tender and brittle, it finishes in earthy knots, and shivers, and this is always found in strata very near the soil, where all regular appearance of stone entirely vanishes.

Not more dependance is there to be placed upon the continuance of any of the strata at a greater depth:

In this neighbourhood, about 40 years since, John duke of Rutland, with the expectation of finding coal, caused the earth to be bored to the depth of 213 feet, chiefly through a calcareous and argillaceous bind, intersected by nine or 10 strata of stone; and when they reached 169 feet about 14 inches of soft coal were met with. On higher ground they bored below the level of the other, till they had pierced 469 feet; not a tenth part of the various strata were stone, and no coal appeared, yet the distance was only two miles from the place of former trial; neither was there any proportion found in the two places, in those strata of alternate clay and stone, at any depth; so that, as is before remarked, one pit gave you very unsatisfactory information respecting the contents of another, though in its own vicinity, so that no judgment could be formed of the stone, coal, or other mineral bodies, which any untried spot was likely to produce.

Near the surface, the plough in a great measure indicates the nature of the beds below. When sand is there, a light arenaceous soil will of course be turned up; if the earthy-brown rock, so common in this neighbourhood, small irregular fragments, with shelly and petrified portions, will be discovered. Sometimes the asteriæ or star-stones are plentiful in the soil, loose and scattered among stony or earthy matters. In the brook at Bottesford (in the Vale), at about three feet depth under its bed, lies a rock, which is composed of little else than masses of these asteriæ; it is entirely calcareous, and when polished makes a beautiful marble. In the liberties of Normanton and Easthorpe, hamlets to Bottesford, the beds of stone are of a very different appearance and quality; and these beds are in some cases about two miles distant, in others not more than one mile.

In Normanton are found pits which yield alternate strata of clay, and a tolerably-hard pale-blue lime-stone. These run for seven or eight strata in a depth of about 10 feet; the weakest stratum of the stone about three inches, and the strongest nine. In all these beds are many petrified marine bodies; they are always found in greater numbers, and more perfect, in the lower strata. Sometimes very large bivalves lie detached from the rock, thick and strong, of sparry texture, and with bituminous smell, when abraded, or struck against each other. Some of these are perfect, some pressed almost flat, and in this latter case, the stone now so hard and solid was evidently in its former soft state, forced by pressure from these breaches made in the shell; and this case seems to have happened (whatever could be the means) prior to the formation of the rock, for they were there surrounded with clay, and lodged between two firm strata of stone, sufficient, judging from their present situation, to guard them from any violence or pressure. In those more perfect, and found in the lower beds, there are very beautiful crystallizations, white, transparent, and hexangular, when broken water gushes from the cavity, and the internal part then resembles a cavern or grotto-work in miniature, brilliant and irregular.

At the lower part of the pits, and in the centre of the rock itself, are to be found pieces of wood, sometimes petrified, but oftener become a substance of peculiar kind; the greater portion is like jet or finer coal, not so light as to swim in water, but it is polishable, and does not stain the fingers; it has nothing calcareous in it, and burns nearly as coal, with sulphureous smoke; of this one piece has been found near four feet long, seven inches broad, and two thick; its specific gravity 1.263. Not one homogeneous body, but a mass of contiguous small pieces without regular form, which are surrounded or held in by septa or thin flakes of a beautiful flesh-coloured substance of flinty texture, the specific gravity of which is 4.8, or near four times as heavy as the bituminous matter; neither is this calcareous [1], but it sparkles in the fire, and undergoes very little change of colour at the point of ignition.

At Easthorpe the stone (excluding the petrified bodies) is of dull earthy-brown colour, and increases greatly in quality the deeper it is found. When it appears, on low ground, near the surface, and especially near a small stream, it is weak, shivery, and indeed scarcely merits the epithet Rock; but in the higher grounds, at nine or ten feet depth only, it is 18 inches thick, and sufficiently compact and durable. This same rock is probably continued to Muston, about a mile distant, since it is there found of the same kind, and apparently in the same level, about three feet thick; all the earth above is a mixture of vegetable mould and blue clay, with here and there a thin stratum of shelly bodies, more frequently the gryphytis or crow-stone.

A part of this rock, or what seems at least of its substance, wears away, and becomes a soft earth on exposition to the weather, more particularly the frosts and thaws of winter; then it is that the shells also in part perish, but many are also detached from the stone, and are to be collected fine and perfect, and in such quantities that I have doubted whether they only, or every other matter composing the heterogeneous body of the rock, exceed in weight; to the eye they seem the principal portion.

The variation of the shelly bodies thus petrified or (in some cases) thus preserved without petrifaction, is as extraordinary as the variety of species. In the same spot are found the fossil Nautilus, known generally by the name of Cornu Ammonis, and particularly that variety which has on the back an elevated ridge between two furrows; of these have been seen specimens three feet in diameter, and with proportionable thickness, and others of the same external character, not weighing five grains, some so ponderous that it was difficult to convey them, and others so light that the weight was unperceived. There are likewise Trochi so minute that 12 of them, with some portion of earth within, have only weighed a single grain.

Of more than 100 species of fossil bodies, which Mr. Mounsey collected in this neighbourhood, 40 at least are the produce of his researches in this pit; and these, for the greater part, in so perfect a state, that if colour be excepted, they lose little by a comparison with the recent shells. This kind of petrifaction is doubtless the most numerous, but not the only one. There are some exuviæ of animals, exclusive of the testaceous class, as vertebræ of cetaceous fish, and coralloid bodies, madrepore, and some other genera.

The wood which is discovered in these places is either petrified or in a state of decay, and not, as some shells, preserved without alteration of substance; in both states the wood shows the grain and circular marks of its annual increase, and the knots also very distinctly. The rock where it is found is of such an heterogeneous nature, that several bodies in actual contact with each other have no resemblance in colour or substance; in one part is limestone; next, a black jaspery pebble, made smooth, and rounded by attrition; here a calcareous body, and there one on which acids have not the smallest effect. There is a composition of earth and clay, wood and pebbles, limestone and spar, with varieties of corallines and testaceous figures, which all together are formed into a tolerably hard and compact mass.

What is here termed the rock, is not one solid bed or floor of stone, but it consists of a vast number of shapeless and disproportioned blocks intimately connected. These blocks are sometimes 600 or 700 pounds weight, and sometimes not more than 20 or 30 pounds. Besides the irregular division of the blocks there are regular lines or seams which run parallel, and are generally from three to nine or ten feet asunder, and occasionally more than 20 feet. These are called by the workmen the South Seams, from their having always their direction North and South, or (as I observed) pointing to the needle with the greatest nicety. Other seams there are which run across in every direction, without any tendency to the formation of regular divisions. Under the beds of stone, even at the bottom of the pit, are found stringy productions, evidently of vegetable origin; they ascend through the fissures and crevices, and it is very difficult to trace them to their termination, at what we might judge to be their root, or at the end next the surface of the soil, but they may be distinctly traced, and even taken out for two or three feet, though oftentimes not thicker than a hair, and always very rotten, tender, and friable, nor have they in any part the resemblance to vegetable fibres, except such as must have been for a long period in a state of total decay. When the strata are thus viewed, with these irregular cracks and regular seams, the horizontal divisions so accurately preserved, and the others, though chiefly with a tendency to be vertical, yet with every variation of obliquity, the mass appears to be tesselated in a curious manner.

When these blocks are long exposed to the weather, and washed frequently by the rain, then the petrified shells appear in every direction, and with every variation in size; some on the exterior side, others on the inner; some of them wrenched from their natural form, and turned from the hinge; in others that mark of the genus is laid bare, and becomes as distinct as in the recent specimens, the teeth elevated and acute, leaving no doubt of the characters; but others are again entirely closed, and between these are some opened in part, in a greater or less degree, whilst on the contrary no small numbers are flattened by pressure, which no longer exists, and heaped upon each other with the greatest confusion.

It is well known to the workmen that water insinuates itself through the different beds of clay, and the seams of the incumbent strata in a very short time, and these seams are thus filled with mud, making a space of about a quarter of an inch, though without any regularity, some being much less in width, and others exceeding that measure. By the perpetual dripping of the moisture in wet seasons, and the constant evaporation in dry and warm weather, the shells become exposed in these crevices, and are thus pitted and imperfect, while those in the opposite sides embedded in the solid rock undergo no alteration, but preserve their original shape, which while they are so situated no external circumstances are likely to affect.

The rock itself sometimes appears to have been broken by some convulsion of Nature, and, being so displaced, to be afterwards re-united. This breach, however occasioned, I have been able to trace through the middle of a petrifaction, and the junction of the parts has been completed by the intervention of sparry matter, but the two divided parts were seldom united again in the same direction, being generally wrenched aside in one place or the other.

There are various pits of stone in the Vale of Belvoir, many of them, in a great degree similar to these I have attempted to describe; others varied, but not so much as to require a particular description, the petrifactions in them not being found in either such numbers or varieties, though these which may be collected are equally as well preserved, and afford many fine specimens.

In a red-sand-stone upon the range of hills near Belvoir Castle, the shells dug out of the midst of the rocks are not petrified, but yet are firm and strong as in their recent state; what alteration they have suffered seems to be in loss of colour, and this is not universally the case. There has been found a specimen not only unchanged in substance, but having that beautiful purple polish within, which is so frequently seen in the foreign species of larger univalves. In other pits they are pale and brittle, but with no further change, being still testaceous, though much more tender than any fresh species.

The nearer these Fossils approach their rocky-bed the more they become assimilated to its substance, and when the body is actually sunk into it, there the petrifaction is complete. These are the more remarkable circumstances which arise in a general survey of the stone pits in this district.

FOSSILIA LEICESTRIENSIA:

OR,

PETRIFIED BODIES FOUND IN THE VALE OF BELVOIR.
FROM THE COLLECTION OF THE REV. WM. MOUNSEY; WITH FIGURES OF THE PRINCIPAL SPECIES.

Petrified animals of the order Mammalia are seldom found in a state so perfect that an accurate judgment may be formed of the living species; nay, it is very probable that such species has not been yet discovered alive. We can therefore only form an indistinct idea of the animal to which these relicks once appertained, and as they are discovered in the same kind of stone, and in the same pits with petrified bodies, evidently marine, we may conclude that these were the bones of some cetaceous fish, which our Naturalists class in the order Mammalia. In Plate I. are figured many bones, some united, others distinct; they vary in size, and probably were not of the same origin. Among these are some which resemble the leg of some short thick quadrupede. See fig. 2, Plate VII. and other figures marked 2, of which it is very difficult to form a satisfactory conjecture.

No. 1, Plate VII. represents a mass of blue stone of calcareous kind, found at Orston under a third stratum, in a pit about eight or nine feet deep. The length of this block is three feet and a half, and its greatest breadth 18 inches; it contains many of the vertebræ and other bones of some animal; the osseous texture is preserved; a calcareous spar fills up the interstices of the bone; but the fibrous part, whether siliceous, or already saturated with some acid, does not ferment with the marine. The seven figures marked 2. are from the same block, but now detached. No. 3, in the same Plate, contains other bones of a smaller animal; and fig. 4, probably a leg, was found at Bennington in the same neighbourhood. The other figures marked 4, are also found at that place. Figures like these are engraved in the ninth Plate of Brander's Fossilia Hantoniensia, and are briefly mentioned by Dr. Solander as the vertebræ of some unknown species of fishes; how far that judgment may be correct, or how these bones, resembling the tibiæ of land animals, will admit of the same decision, we must not venture to determine.

In the Lythophylaceum Britannicum Luidii, are some ill-executed figures of animal remains under his class Chylostea, which resemble these vertebræ; and Dr. Woodward, in his Catalogues, has many varieties of different parts of Mammalia, but whether the cetaceous, or of any other order, cannot be determined, both from the want of figures, and from the great uncertainty which the question is involved in.

In the collection of the Rev. Mr. Turner, rector of Denton, in the vicinity of Belvoir Castle, are two blocks of stone, hard, but coarse, and of dull greyish colour; these, when in one mass, about four or five feet long and nearly two broad, were luckily split, and discovered the convex and concave skeleton of an animal; the bones were not much distorted from their natural position; they are completely petrified, and are become of the same nature with the stone itself. Conjecture is wearied by endeavours to determine the quadruped to which these remains once belonged; nor is it very improbable that they are all which in these climates can ever be seen of it.

Horns, of some animal of the order Pecora, and genus Bos, have been lately found at Bottesford; they are larger than those of any taurine species we are acquainted with, are widely extended, and of great strength; the texture firm, the surface smooth, and between the horns dark and polished.

Under the head Amphibiolithus, or, according to other Fossiologists, Ichthyolithus, are ranged certain parts of marine amphibia, among which one of the most common is the Glossopetra, or petrified teeth of the Shark; they vary somewhat in shape and size, but generally are in both like the common horse-leech. They are wrinkled on the surface, are of compact sparry texture, and of dark glaucous-green colour. They are called by some authors Limaculus. They are occasionally to be met with among the fossils of the Vale. See Plate VIII. fig. 16.

We now proceed to that order of fossil bodies named Helmintholithus, that is, petrifactions of any of those animals which come under the denomination Vermes (worms), of which the testacea afford by far the greater number, and of these are the principal part of such collections as are formed of fossils and petrifactions.

1. Helmintholithus Nautilites, the petrified Spiral Nautilus, or Cornu Ammonis.

These are sufficiently common in many parts of the kingdom, and are of many varieties; but few of these variations are found in one pit, or in one neighbourhood. As has been observed, they are of almost every dimension, from two or three feet diameter to a one line. They are in general calcareous, and for the most part coarse and mixed with sand and clay; there are, nevertheless, many exceptions, which have a sparry texture and may be polished very highly.

The varieties in these pits are,

1. With the back (ambitus) entirely smooth. These have the exterior figure of the Nautilus; but whether their inward structure be concamerated is uncertain. See Plate VIII. fig. 20. Diameter of the larger seven inches.

2. The back furrowed; the furrows equal, neither the middle part nor border being prominent. This variety not only differs from the more common in the exterior character, but in the substance itself, being selenitical, at least so far as respects the matter which fills up the cellular divisions. Found in clay at Muston. They are small; an inch diameter, and under.

3. The back flatted, having the ridges on the face (the disk) carried through, and therefore the same in number over the whole petrifaction. One surface is very convex, the other plane, like some Helices. Small, one line and a half diameter.

4. The back furrowed with double furrows (sulcis bifidis), and thus containing twice so many as the disk. Found in gravel. Size about two inches. Of this kind are many found by the banks of the Humber.

5. With a single furrow in the middle of the back. The surface with striæ alternately shorter. Found in the bed of the river at Bottesford. Small.

6. The back has a prominent middle ridge, between two furrows. This is the common kind, of which Mr. Mounsey has found almost every possible variation of dimension, from three feet diameter to one line. They are in vast numbers about the roads and highways; generally coarsely calcareous, but occasionally fair and sparry.

To these may be added the following:

A petrifaction, apparently a Nautilus (the Nautilitis Lithophylaceum Luidii), with a prominent ridge at the back, and the surface with wave-like lines (undulatim-striato). Size 18 lines diameter, with another Nautilitis of the same author (263), supposed a petrifaction of the Pearly Nautilus. It is a foot in diameter when large, but some only three inches. Neither of these are so distinctly marked as the foregoing.

When the petrified body is small, and (as it often happens) the aperture is invisible or imperfectly distinguished, it is extremely difficult to ascertain the genus of testacea to which it belongs. The three genera, Trochus, Turbo, and Helix, and, in small specimens, even Conus and Murex may be confounded; not to take into consideration that these appellations being given, and their character assigned from recent species, there will be found in the fossil shell something which, in a certain degree, varies from that character.

On this account it is that these names are given with much hesitation; and many collectors of either recent or fossil shells would doubtless remove a part of them into other genera.

Conus.

1. A Conus, with seven or eight volutions, having the lower borders acute. Length two lines. Plate VII. fig. 18. a. its natural size.

2. A pyriform shell. Conus? Smooth, with short obtuse spire. The whole sub-cylindrical. Size of the last. Plate VIII. fig. 19. b. natural size.

Trochus.

1. A studded Trochus. The volutions, with regular tubercles; resembles the Trochus nodulosus of the Hampshire fossils, but is less, and has less the form of the genus. Plate VIII. fig. 21. magnified; c. natural size.

2. A small Trochus, with longitudinal distant striæ; one line in length, and of the same breadth.

3. A Trochus, with the volutions striated transversely, and the larger striæ duplicate about one third of an inch.

4. An umbilicated Trochus, with acute volutions, decussately striate. One fourth of an inch size.

5. An obovate smooth Trochus (Anfractibus per Carinam disjunctis). Very small.

6. A widely-umbilicated Trochus, with an acute spire, studded transversely. In the broader part an inch; length eight lines.

7. An umbilicated Trochus, with an acute spire. The volutions studded one way, and striated the other. Varies in size; some two inches. Plate VIII. fig. 20. natural size.

Turbo.

A. Those ovate or oblong.

1. A sub-triangular Turbo, with six volutions, studded and striated. Length eight; breadth six lines.

2. An ovate species, or ovato-oblong, varies from seven lines long to two. The volutions acutely raised in the middle; studded and striated.

Under the term Turbinites are described and figured several petrifactions, which resemble these in the Lithophylaceum before quoted. See Plate VIII. fig. 29.

3. An umbilicated Turbo, transversely striated, and decussated with numerous longitudinal oblique lines. Length 16 lines; breadth 16. See Plate VIII. fig. 26.

4. A small ovate Turbo, with sub-angular aperture (Trochus ?), the spire transversely striated. Length three lines.

5. A Turbo smooth, umbilicated, sub-ovate. Long three lines; broad 2.

6. A rounded Turbo, sub-umbilicated, transversely striated, the umbilicus small, and longitudinal. Diameter three lines.

7. A Turbo sub-rotund, with six sub-striated volutions. Like the figures styled Cochleæ clavicula productiore of some authors, rather lengthened out. Plate VIII. fig. 27.

8. A small smooth Turbo, with cordate aperture; the spire short, the volutions sub-striated. Varies much. Plate VIII. fig. 24. d. natural size.

9. An umbilicated Turbo; sub-rotund, with four or five smooth volutions. Resembles some Helices. Plate VIII. fig. 28. g. natural size.

10. A smooth sub-umbilicated Turbo; roundish, with the volutions concave, and carinated. Diameter ten lines. Plate VIII. fig. 23.

11. A smooth umbilicated Turbo; roundish, with the volutions convex, and carinated. The carina acute. Diameter eight lines.

12. A roundish Turbo, having a single series of studs (nodi) in the first volution, and these only. Diameter ten lines; others less. Plate VIII. fig. 22.

13. A rounded umbilicated Turbo, with angular smooth volutions; the aperture round. Two lines diameter. Plate VIII. figure below fig. 25. l. natural size.

TURBO.

B. With very long spire.

These are the Strombi or Needles of some authors. They have in their form a strong resemblance to some recent species, but other exterior characters are different.

14. A long acute-angled Turbo, with double and carinated volutions. Length 10 lines; breadth two.

15. An obtuse-angled Turbo of the needle kind, longitudinally striated. Length from eight to nine lines.

16. A decussately-striated long Turbo, with rounded volutions, with strait striæ. Plate VIII. fig. 33. enlarged. The natural length four lines.

17. A Needle-Turbo, decussately striated. The volutions 12—14; the longitudinal striæ deep. Plate VIII. fig. 32.

18. A Turbo of this kind, but not so much produced. The volutions eight; the striæ transverse, and superficial. Plate VIII. fig. 30. but enlarged.

19. A Turbo (duplicatus Linnæi), with 14 smooth carinated volutions. Length 18 lines; breadth five.

20. A smooth Turbo, with 12 14 volutions; more produced than 19, else resembling it. Plate VIII. fig. 31. enlarged. Length about nine lines.

HELIX.—The SNAIL.

1. An Helix, or Turbo; fragile, with lunar aperture, smooth spire, and six smooth volutions. Plate VIII. fig. 34.

2. A large Helix; ovate, ponderous; smooth, with six volutions. Perhaps a Turbo. Length 40 lines; breadth 44.

PATELLA.—LIMPET.

A small fossil shell, with the character of the Limpet; the margin very whole, and the top imperforated. The diameter from two to three lines.

SERPULA.—The WORM-SHELL.

Clusters of Serpula (the Vermicularis of Linné, but smaller than the fresh specimens) are frequently found, with more or less of the shelly exterior remaining in our blocks of stone. See Plate VIII. fig. 4. and the figure above, where they are cut transversely.

2. Serpula lumbricalis? Cylindrical. Varies much in dimension. See four figures in Plate VIII. No. 6.

3. Plate VIII. fig. 5. This has in the figure the appearance of an Entrochus. It is placed here with some hesitation. It is articulated, and the joints elevated. See two specimens fig. 5.

BIVALVE PETRIFACTIONS.

TELLINÆ.—CUNEI.

These in general have the form of the recent Tellens, but the joints cannot always be seen. The name of Cunei (wedges) is given from their shape. They incline to one side; the hinge not being in the middle.

1. A cuneiform Tellen, with coarse transverse striæ. The sulcated fossil Cunei of Da Costa, heavy, sparry. Vary much. Some 14 lines long and 21 broad.

2. A thick cuneiform Tellen, with deeper valves; else like No. 1. Length 20 lines; breadth 26.

3. An ovato-cuneiform Tellen, with transverse striæ. Length and breadth 19 lines and 29.

4. An ovato-cuneiform Tellen (a variety of three), larger. The striæ transverse.

5. A striated cuneiform Tellen, produced so as to approach the form of the Solen (razor-shell), but broader some than others. Proportion of breadth to length 54 to 24. Plate IX. fig. 3.

6. A Tellen, with recurved beak; wedge-form, with transverse striæ; the valves boat-shaped (navicular). Two inches long; four to five broad. Plate IX. fig. 3.

7. An oblong wedge-form Tellen, compressed (natibus elevatis). Plate IX. fig. 4. a. natural size.

8. A more ovate Tellen; smooth, with sub-rotund valves. An inch long; two broad.

9. Tellen? or perhaps Cardium. The same in the Lithophylaceum Luidii, fig. 774. Musculites.

10. A sub-orbicular Tellen? smooth, and gibbous (natibus prominentibus altera majore). 15 lines to 12.

11. An ovato sub-rotund Tellen; striated with numerous transverse striæ (natibus elevatis). Breadth 21; length 18 lines. Plate IX. fig. 6.

CARDIUM.

1. A small Cardium; striated, with many minute decussating striæ, longitudinal, and transverse. Breadth five lines.

2. A Cardium? with about 20 longitudinal striæ; resembles the Pecten, but appears of this genus. The striæ equal, and not alternately greater and less. Long 10 lines; broad 9.

3. Fragment of a Cardium; rugged, with vaulted squammæ (Isocardium Linnœi). Breadth 26 lines.

DONAX.

Plate IX. fig. 7. Donax; sub-triangular, transversely furrowed. Perhaps a Venus. Diameter seven lines.

VENUS.

1. Varieties of the species Gallina, small, but resemble the recent shell. Klein, table X. fig. 50. Diameter two lines. Plate IX. fig. 8. b. natural size.

2. A sub-rotund Venus, transversely radiated with seven to eight radii. Shell thick. Breadth ten lines; length seven.

3. A small Venus, with longitudinal striæ, and three of four circular rays. Diameter five lines. Plate IX. fig. 9. c. natural size.

4. A smooth Venus, small; varies from three lines diameter to one.

CHAMA.

1. With longitudinal rugose ridges ten to twelve, and transverse striæ. Klein, table X. fig. 53. but his figure is larger, and more rugged. Varies from eight to five lines long, and from 15 to 9 broad. Plate IX. fig. 10.

ARCA.

1. With decussated striæ, remote and incurved beaks; has affinity with the Arca Lactea, 106 of the Hampshire fossils. Length three lines; breadth five. Plate IX. fig. 11. d. natural size.

2. An Arca, more smooth, with slight transverse striæ; the beaks approximating. This also like the Arca Lactea. Plate IX. fig. 12. d. natural size.

3. A small smooth Arca, of Tellen shape (natibus approximatis). Long two lines; broad three. Plate IX. fig. 13. d. natural size.

SPONDYLUS.

Species uncertain; a Gœdaropus? Not thorny; unequally rugged; the rugæ irregular. It is not a petrifaction, but in a shelly state. Plate IX. fig. 14. natural size.

OSTREA.

A. Pectens.

1. A Pecten? angular, with elevated longitudinal ribs, irregularly and transversely striated. A curious and scarce fossil. The ribs run out into spines. Plate IX. fig. 15. natural size.

2. A Pecten, with unequal ears; the valves convex; the striæ alternately less; the form oblique. Diameter 15 lines. Plate IX. fig. 16.

3. A Pecten, with obsolete rays, and transverse striæ. Diameter 14 lines.

4. A smooth, or obsoletely-striated Pecten. Diameter about 15 lines.

5. A Pecten, like those frequently found both fossil and recent. The striæ very numerous; one valve convex. Varies in diameter, 18 lines to 8. Plate IX. fig. 17.

6. A Pecten, found in shelly state frequently. Pecten recondita; Hampshire fossils. Diameter one inch.

7. Fragment of Ostræa maxima. Diameter three inches.

8. A striated Pecten, with equal ears obliquely ovate; the longitudinal striæ alternately greater. Diameter 24 lines, but varies much. The genus doubtful; the specimens very neat. Plate IX. fig. 19. and another represented open.

9. A Pecten? with sub-equal ears, and minute longitudinal striæ. Shell smooth; sides unequal. Found recent in America, and sold by the name of Clams.

10. A Pecten, with rays about 12; the scales imbricated. Plate IX. fig. 20.

11. A Pecten, with decussated striæ, and with small squamæ. Diameter five inches.

12. A rounded Pecten, smooth; large. Diameter four and five inches.

13. A smooth Pecten? equal eared. About 14 lines diameter. Plate IX. fig. 18.

14. A Pecten? varying in size. Character doubtful. Diameter three and four inches.

B.—OYSTERS.

15. A species resembling the Edulis, but more oblong and smoother. Long 32 lines; broad 20.

16. Another. Genus uncertain. Long 42 lines; broad 27.

Many valves are found which appear to belong to species of this genus, or that of Spondylus, one like the small red oyster, common in the West Indies, which adheres to coral, &c.; others have an hinge somewhat differing. See Plate IX. figs. 22 and 23.

17. The Gryphyte, or Crow-stone, a petrifaction common in many parts of this kingdom; here very perfect. Each valve and the contents in the state of compact spar are frequently to be met with. They often resemble in quality the Belemnite, and are bituminous. All are of calcareous substance. It is often considered as an Anomia.

18. The Ostrea Ephippium, the Glass or pellucid Oyster, is found preserved, and not much altered. Diameter 22 lines. Plate IX. fig. 21.

ANOMIA.

These are found in prodigious numbers, and often form a great part of the very substance of the rock. They are in general completely petrified.

1. An angulated Anomia; one of the least common. Plate IX. fig. 24.
2. Anomia Plicatella. Linnæi.
3. Anomia Terebratule. Linnæi.

In this genus the gradations in form and substance vary so insensibly, and the species or varieties so approach each other, that it is very difficult to give them any appropriate name, or indeed to describe them. They take the nature of the substance they are embedded in, and may be found of the purest spar, and of the coarsest stone; often friable; sometimes admitting polish. The species are not many, but the varieties numerous.

PHOLAS?

An oblong striated rugged Pholas? having the form of the Dactylus, with many longitudinal and transverse striæ. It is 28 lines broad, and about 12 long. Plate IX. fig. 25 to 28. also possibly a variety.

MYTILUS.

1. The petrified Muscle, most common here, resembles the Edulis, but is more narrow and smaller. It is about 26 lines in breadth, and about nine long.

2. Another species resembles a small recent one from the West Indies, but is somewhat narrower in proportion to its length. Dimensions three lines and four.

PINNA.

1. A fragment of fossil Pinna is frequently observed in the common stone of this country, but no character of the genus can be distinguished except the form. Plate IX. fig. 26.

2. Plate IX. fig. 27. a large fossil Pinna, nearly a foot in length, and at the broad termination 80 lines in width. a. and f. shews it intersected. It is seldom found perfect, and not often in a fossil state, but impressions of this or some species are to be seen in the common stone of the country.

ECHINITES.

1. Petrifactions of Echini are not so frequent in this district as in countries abounding with gravel. The Echinus Spatagus is the one here met with, and that only where there is a gravelly soil. None are to be traced in the building quarries or common stone of the vicinity.

BELEMNITES.

The Tubulus Marinus of Klein; Thunder-stone; Nautilus Belemnita. Found of various dimensions, always conic, but with greater or less proportion of length to the base, often filled with a nucleus at the greater termination; the substance sparry, but uniformly and strongly bituminous. They vary from seven or eight inches to so many lines in length. This is the Nautilus Belemnita of Linné, in the later editions of the Systema Naturæ.

ASTERIA.

The Asteria or Star-stone, so common in this district, are said to be portions of the Star-fish petrified; what species of that animal produced these joints may not be easily determined. They are figured in Plott's Oxfordshire, and are found, though very sparingly, on the Lincolnshire coast. They are either single stones, with star-like impressions on each side, or articulated masses, with numbers varying from two to 40, or upwards. See Plate VIII. fig. 11, 12, 13, 14.

These species vary in some respects. Fig. 14 the common kind; fig. 12 has the radii very acute; in fig. 13 one ray is more eminent.

Fig. 9 is a single variety with four radii, and these very perfect and regular.

Fig. 7 is a mass of ramified Asteria, or rather some part of the animal connected with them. It is a singular fossil, and very rarely to be found.

Fig. 8 appears to be Asteria formed like Entrochi. Very small.

MADREPORITES.

The Madrepora Porpita, vulgò Button-stone, is here to be collected in a perfectly fossil state, with the stria all preserved.

A singular variety, or perhaps species, occurs, Plate VIII. fig. 15. Porpita duplicata.

Branched white Coral (Madrepora fascicularis?) in small pieces are to be collected, but is not frequent.

To these may be added that Selenite (Gypsum Selenites) pellucid and crystallized is occasionally found in the Vale (at Stathern).

The Ludus Helmontii, a compound mass of clay and calx, with crystallized spar, and frequently with the Cornu Ammonis, or impressions of it, occurs in some places.

A bituminous fossil also occurs in the blue limestone at Bottesford. It is composed of various cells or compartments formed of Gypsum, or perhaps Barytes, and filled with tessulæ of Lithantrax resembling cannel coal. See Plate VIII. fig. 3. the right hand part of the mass. Fig. 2 gives some idea of the stone found at Bottesford with asteria rising in various directions; and fig. 1. a block of stone from Easthorpe pits, conveys some notion of the confused assemblage of shells, pebbles, earth, wood, &c. &c. found so often there, and in such astonishing variety.

[1] Theſe Returns are now for the firſt time printed from an accurate copy, tranſcribed from the original at the proper office in the Houſe of Commons.

[2] By a Report made to the Houſe of Commons, May 23, 1787, from a Committee appointed to inſpect and conſider theſe Returns, it appeared that out of nearly 13,000 pariſhes and townſhips in England and Wales (from which returns of charitable donations had been required) there were only 14 pariſhes that had made no returns; that, many of the returns having been defective, 4065 circular letters were ſent, to require more perfect returns; to which 3376 anſwers were received. And by a ſecond report, June 10, 1788, it appeared that the annual amount of the produce of the money given for charitable purpoſes, throughout England and Wales, as far as can be collected, is 48,243*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*; and the annual produce of the lands 210,467*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* making together 258,710*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*; of which the ſhare of the county of Leiceſter was, in money, 1024*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*; in land, 4877*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*; together, 5901*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*

WYFORDBY.

Left by one Money[1] of Wyfordby ten ſhillings per ann. to the poor of Wyfordby, to be paid out of Sir John Hartopp's eſtate at Wyfordby. This was paid till within theſe 40 years paſt by William Dilkes, and after him by his ſon, who were ſtewards to Sir John Hartopp. There was a bond for the payment of this ſum kept by the overſeer of the poor; upon this being worn out, Dilkes has been frequently heard to ſay, that as there was nothing to ſhew, he would pay the ten ſhillings per ann. no longer. Dilkes, jun. did not live more than five or ſix years after he diſcontinued paying this money. Mrs. Elizabeth Dallowe, of Epſom, daughter of Sir John Hartopp, and widow of ——— Dallowe, M. D. is the preſent poſſeſſor of the eſtate out of which the ten ſhillings per ann. uſed to be paid.

This is upon the teſtimony of William Fairbrother, of Brentingby, a pariſh adjoining to Wyfordby, a perſon of the age of 75, has lived the major part of his life at Brentingby, the place of his nativity, who perfectly well recollects the above circumſtances.

[1] See p. 15.

⁂ It has been already ſtated, by a note in the firſt page of theſe Returns, that, ſome of them having been originally defective, circular letters had been diſpatched, to require more particular information. The ſubſtance of the ſecond Returns, as far as relates to the Hundred of Framland, is here given. In the future Hundreds they ſhall be added in each pariſh, in ſuch a manner that the original Returns (which were upon Oath) may appear diſtinct from the amendments, in which that formality of proceeding was not required.

P. 1. Abkettleby. Miſs Stokes of Nottingham, and Mr. Dexter of Holwell, are proprietors of the land mentioned in the firſt article, and pay the donation.

Ibid. John Steel's benefaction produces 1 l. 2s.; of which two thirds are for Abkettleby, and one third for Holwell.

Ibid. Holwell. The lands whence the two donations of the Hurſts are payable are veſted in John Crumpton, Eſq; of Derby.

P. 3. Nether Broughton. The donation of Samuel Wray and Thomas Wright was, " To the poor not receiving pariſh relief;" and, " The truſtees are the officers of the pariſh; who always diſpoſe of it on St. Thomas's day, at a meeting of all the pariſhioners who chooſe to attend."

P. 6. Garthorpe. The donation of William Hubbard (£.5.) is veſted in the miniſter and churchwarden. It is in the hands of the churchwarden for the time being, who pays it to his ſucceſſor, with 5s. intereſt; and ſo on from one to another as they come into office annually.

The donations of John Miles and John Turner (£.20. from each) are both for an Engliſh ſchool. They are in the hands of the Rev. George Boulton, miniſter of the pariſh of Garthorpe, and of his brother D'Arcy Boulton, Eſq; of Melton Mowbray. The annual produce is £.2.

P. 7. Harby. Mr. Major's donation is veſted in the rector.

P. 8. Melton Mowbray. " William Reeve," and the other perſons mentioned in the laſt article of this page, are " Truſtees of Hudſon's Hoſpital."

P. 9. The lands allotted for " the cotte common," line 8, are three acres and a half.

Ibid. William Reeve, William Reeve, jun. and Thomas Black, are truſtees of Storer's charity; and in them the donation of Mary Briggs, l. 27, is veſted.

P. 10. Burton Lazars. " Fifty pounds were left by William Squire, to be veſted in the vicar of Melton Mowbray; but the widow expended more than the donation in repairing the monument, and died within two years after her huſband's deceaſe; ſo that the ſum of fifty pounds aforeſaid has never been paid to the truſtee."

P. 11. Redmile. Thomas Furmadge, who died inteſtate on the 19th of Sept. 1785, deſired that his father would give the ſum of five pounds, out of the money he died poſſeſſed of, to the pariſh of Redmile; the intereſt of which ſhould be given annually at Chriſtmas to five poor widows: which the father, now living, promiſed ſhould be done; and for theſe two years laſt paſt has paid the five ſhillings as deſired; but has not yet paid the five pounds, nor given any ſecurity to the pariſh (though preſſed to it); but ſtill ſays he intends to do it, but fixes no time.

P. 12. Somerby. John Gobert, by will, dated March 10, 1723, gave ſix hundred pounds, to be laid out in the purchaſe of lands and tenements, the produce of which to be applied for ever to the uſe and purpoſe in the ſaid will expreſſed; viz. for the maintenance of two poor ſcholars at Oxford and Cambridge ſixteen pounds yearly, viz. eight pounds each; forty ſhillings to the poor of South Kilworth, and forty ſhillings to the poor of Somerby, in Leceſterſhire; and four pounds yearly to the town of Hatfield Broadoak, Eſſex. The reſidue to be for ever diſtributed to poor preaching miniſters, and to the widows and children of poor miniſters deceaſed. All which he willed to be diſpoſed of by his wife during her life; and after her deceaſe, by the eldeſt ſon of his daughter Barrington, deceaſed, and her right heirs for ever. Since which, St. John Barrington, heir at law, purchaſed the manor of Keeres in Aythorpe Roothing, in the county of Eſſex, and ſettled it to the uſes of the will. The pariſh of Somerby have regularly received forty ſhillings yearly from Mr. Barrington, which the vicar has (with the advice of the principal inhabitants) diſtributed annually amongſt the moſt deſerving poor, but never to eaſe the poor rates.

P. 12. Stapleford. The abſence of the Earl of Harborough from Stapleford, at the time the Return was made, prevented ſo accurate a ſtatement as would otherwiſe have been given. The following account will, it is hoped, be ſufficiently explicit. The hundred pounds was expended by the father of the preſent Earl of Harborough, in fitting up, what had been a dog-kennel, for the accommodation of ſix men. The preſent Earl, thinking the ſituation unhealthy, has built a very handſome one for their reception, at the expence of more than £.1000. and intended to make a conſiderable addition to the endowment; which intention, however, he means to wave till the buſineſs of the preſent will is determined. Should not theſe particulars be ſatisfactory, the original will is to be found in the court of Chancery, where it was proved about the year 1733. It muſt be further added, that the Earl of Harborough conſiders the endowment as his own property; being ſolely veſted in himſelf and his heirs, the future proprietors of Stapleford; and being founded only for old ſervants of the family, or decayed tenants of any one of the ſix pariſhes mentioned in the return, without any application to the poor, or mentioning the tenants under that denomination. Its intention is reward.

P. 13. Stathern. Add to the 6th article, " The annual produce of theſe beqeſts cannot be ſtated ſeparately: Jane Sills left £.10. and the Rev. Andrew Pern £.40.; both were in the hands of the late rector, Chriſtopher Lonſdale, who ordered £.100. New South-ſea ſtock to be transferred into the hands of his ſucceſſor and the officers of the pariſh (if they choſe to accept of it), inſtead of the £.50. above mentioned. This was accepted, and the produce applied at the diſcretion of the miniſter and inhabitants. At preſent it is paid for the education of ſome poor children.

P. 14. Wyfordby. Thomas Money, who died in 1676, ſold a cottage to Sir John Hartoppe (as William Fairbrother believes), ſubject to the payment of 10s. per annum; and Sir John gave a bond to the overſeer of the poor of the pariſh of Wyfordby. This bond lay in the hands of the overſeers till it was worn out and loſt. When this bond could not be produced, Mr. Dilke (ſteward to the family above mentioned) ſaid he would pay the 10s. per annum no longer. Mrs. Elizabeth Dalloe, of Epſom, (daughter of the late Sir John Hartoppe) is in poſſeſſion of the eſtate, out of which the money uſed to be paid. It is near forty years ſince this money uſed to be paid.

FOXTON.	Gave by Lady Langley,			To the poor, to be diſtributed at St. Thomas's, [1] "May 26, 1712, Memorandum, at this time, when other accounts of the pariſh were paſſed, was received, the full ſum of £.5. together with full intereſt of £.5. per cent. being the charity money of Lady Langley, for the uſe of the poor of this pariſh yearly, and particularly at St. Thomas's.—N. B. The above memorandum appears in Foxton churchwardens' book, made by William Lewis, now deceaſed, that he received the ſaid ſum, and repaid the principal of £.5. to Robert Saddington, in whoſe family it has remained ever ſince, and intereſt been received by different pariſh officers, viz. churchwardens or overſeers, till St. Thomas, 1776. John Saddington, who died 1780, was the firſt who ſtopt payment, ſaying, he would neither pay principal or intereſt till compelled to it by law. Though many times demanded, no proceſs having been iſſued, it has remained under the ſame declaration till the preſent time. Thomas Saddington is the eldeſt ſon of the ſaid John deceaſed." Amended Return.	in caſh [1],	We believe this ſum was paid yearly by each churchwarden to his ſucceſſor, with 5s. for the intereſt; and that it came into the hands of Thomas Saddington, of Foxton, as churchwarden, ſince deceaſed, who never paid the money to his ſucceſſor [2]. The late Rev. William Hanbury, rector of Church Langton, left, by ſundry deeds, ſeveral ſums of money for various purpoſes, ſet forth in a book, entitled "The Hiſtory of the Charitable Foundations eſtabliſhed at Church Langton," (which is divided into Eaſt and Weſt, and Thorpe and Tur), which is by far too voluminous to recite in this ſchedule; none of which are to commence (except at the diſcretion of the truſtees) until the whole of the foundations take place according to the explanatory deed.—It is certain that none of this charity (except at the diſcretion of the truſtees as aforeſaid) will commence in leſs time than ſome hundred years, according to the tenor of the above deed. 42 0 0

There is a piece of land, called the Town Cloſe, within the lordſhip, which has been let for ſome years paſt at the rent of £.5.; of which four pounds have been annually paid to the overſeers of the poor of this pariſh, and applied in aid of the poor's rate. It is not known at what time, or in what way, or by whom, this eſtate was left; there being neither tradition nor document to throw any light upon the ſubject. The tenant, Thomas Bryon, took the land of the miniſter and churchwardens, and other inhabitants, aſſembled in veſtry, ſome years ſince; and, according to the conditions of the tenure, pays the rent of £.4. to the overſeers of the poor; but holds only from year to year. The maſter-men of the pariſh, upon a remonſtrance that this rent ought not to be blended with the poor's rate, but be applied directly to the help of the poor, have not long ago agreed unanimouſly to appropriate it towards ſupporting a Sunday ſchool; which accordingly is to be opened on the firſt Sunday after Michaelmas-day next.

STOCKERSTON.				It is evident, from an old pariſh-book, that £.10. had been left to the poor of Stockerſton; but no mention is made when or by whom. The intereſt money was paid in 1680 to 1684; but no names or ſum is ſpecified till 1685. Then it appears that John Rawlins paid ſix ſhillings, and Robert Ireland the other part, being four ſhillings. In 1688 this intereſt was paid by Hugh Brown The donation was lent upon bond to the ſaid perſons; and it appears that the ſaid Hugh Brown ſtopped payment in the year 1696. It alſo appears, that Benjamin Rawlins, and not John, paid the ſix ſhillings for the year 1708; and continued to diſcharge his bond-debt till 1717. After that period, no payment can be diſcovered of either principal or intereſt; therefore the charitable donation has been ſunk about ſixty-eight or nine years. (Signed) EDWARD WHITMELL, Curate. [1] "No truſtees, or any document whatever upon the ſubject. The one ſhilling and ſixpence was paid till for the laſt ten years. It is a rent charged upon a houſe and land in Fleckney, let for about £.10. a year, belonging to John Talbot, of Neſton, in Northamptonſhire. William Harrold, the churchwarden of Fleckney, called upon the ſaid Talbot at Neſton on the 15th of Sept. laſt, and aſked if he would in future pay the ſaid donation out of his ſaid eſtate; and John Talbot anſwered, that he would." Amended Return.

[2] "The donation of one ſhilling a year is likewiſe a rent-charge upon a houſe and homeſtead in Fleckney, the property of Edward Shapleſs, of Arneſby, in this county. It has not been paid for about ten years; but upon the application of the ſaid William Harrold, made on the 17th inſt. the ſaid Edward Shapleſs ſaid he was willing to pay it regularly for the future. No evidence or document whatever is to be obtained upon the ſubject of this donation." Ibid.

[1] "The miniſter and churchwardens for the time being were to have had the diſpoſal of this charity.—The opinion of counſel has been taken relative to this charity; who are all clearly agreed, that the teſtator dying three days after he made his will, and leaving no perſonalty for the payment of the ſaid legacy, the executor is diſcharged by the Act of Mortmain from any obligation to make good the ſaid legacy. Therefore it has never been demanded by the pariſh." Amended Return.

[2] "It was not a legacy in money.—The heirs and aſſigns of James Sculthorpe, Thomas Chapman, jun. and others, were to have had the diſpoſal of this charity.—It was a rent-charge of 30*s.* per ann. payable out of an eſtate in land left to the family of Farnham. In our former anſwer to your enquiries we had not been able to find out the donor's name who had left this rent-charge, payable out of the Farnham eſtate; but we have ſince found, that a Mrs. Kaye, of Blith, in Yorkſhire, relict of the Rev. Mr. Kaye of that place, bequeathed an eſtate to Charles Farnham, Eſq; chargeable with the payment of 30*s.* per annum to the poor of Quorndon for ever; but there is a clauſe in the will, ordering this charity to be diſtributed according to a ſchedule afterwards to be delivered to the truſtees. No ſuch ſchedule can now be found; and therefore this charity has been withheld for four years paſt, on a plea of not knowing the uſes for which it was given." Amended Return.

[1] "There are none act; but as far as we can find, upon the further enquiry which has been now ordered by parliament, thoſe who ſhould act are, Taylor White, Eſq; of Walling Wells, in Nottinghamſhire, by right of his wife, who, before marriage, was Sarah, daughter and coheireſs of Sir Iſaac Wollaſton, the laſt ſurviving of the three original truſtees, and Dame Anne Fowke, of Loweſby, in Leiceſterſhire, relict of Sir Thomas Fowke, the other daughter and coheireſs of the ſaid Sir Iſaac Wollaſton; the very ſame perſons who are accountable for this embezzled charity money, on account of their ſaid father, Sir Iſaac Wollaſton, having received the ſame as laſt ſurviving truſtee; of whoſe receipt for the ſame, dated June 22, 1750, we have now got a copy, and the original is in the cuſtody of Mr. Iſaac Carter, attorney, of Leiceſter, ſon of Thomas Carter, one of the original truſtees for this charity. In our firſt account to parliament of this charity, to the queſtion, 'In whom now veſted?' we, finding all the original truſtees dead, and none acting in their ſtead, anſwered, 'We ſuppoſe in the high court of Chancery;' becauſe we judged that, in ſuch a caſe, it was the province of the ſaid court to appoint new truſtees to act, as none appeared to have been appointed by the ſurvivors of the original truſtees. And upon further ſearching the will concerning this charity, we find, that the truſt is thereby limited to the executors or adminiſtrators of the original truſtees, by adminiſtrators meaning heirs; for the will in another part uſes the word heirs inſtead of adminiſtrators; ſaying, that their heirs or executors ſhall not be accountable for the loſs of any money without their own default. Now, agreeable to this limitation of the will, a perſon ſkilled in grammatical conſtructions, but not in deviations of the law from ſuch conſtructions, would have ſuppoſed that the heirs or repreſentatives of all the three original truſtees ſhould now act in the truſt; and accordingly we made it our buſineſs to ſearch who were theſe ſeveral repreſentatives; but when we came to the aforenamed Mr. Iſaac Carter, to enquire who was his father Thomas Carter's repreſentative, and who his uncle Sir Lawrence Carter's repreſentative, he anſwered, it was not neceſſary for us to know theſe particulars; for as the truſt was in the nature of a joint-tenancy, notwithſtanding the grammatical conſtruction of its limitation, when Sir Lawrence Carter was dead, who died firſt of the three truſtees, the repreſentatives of the ſaid Sir Lawrence could not interfere to act by law in his ſtead with the two ſurviving truſtees; and in the ſame manner when T. Carter was alſo dead, who died ſecond, neither could the repreſentatives of Sir Lawrence and T. Carter by law interfere to act with the ſurviving truſtee, Sir I. Wollaſton; but that the whole truſt then devolved by law to the ſaid Sir Iſaac; and upon his death to his repreſentatives only, entirely excluding the repreſentatives of the other truſtees; and Sir I. Wollaſton's repreſentatives are, as before deſcribed, Taylor White, Eſq; and Dame Anne Fowke. E. W. C." Amended Return.

	John Kirk, late of Burton on the Woulds, in the county of Leiceſter, Gent.	not known,	by will, as is ſuppoſed,	Towards the maintenance of a ſchool-maſter at Preſtwould, in the county of Leiceſter, four pounds by the year, and four pounds in the year, to buy coals for the poor of Burton aforeſaid, as by Ironmonger, Helmſley, Wileman, &c. and the ſurvivor of them ſhould appoint; and four pounds by the year to cloath ſix poor boys, of Burton aforeſaid, with caps, coats, ſtockings, and ſhoes; and the other forty ſhillings, as it ſhould be increaſed, to be paid for the binding of any of thoſe boys apprentice. Amended Return.	0 15 0

And by certain notes in writing, dated Jan. 23, 1656, it appears that the teſtator's lands in Burton and Wymerwould aforeſaid were deviſed to Roger Waldram, George Noble, &c. and their heirs, to receive the rents of thoſe lands, until they had raiſed money to purchaſe the value of fourteen pounds by the year for the purpoſes aforeſaid. But the rents of the ſaid teſtator's lands have not been received by the truſtees in the ſaid will according to the directions therein; neither have any lands been purchaſed to the value of fourteen pounds by the year; notwithſtanding which, the owners of ſaid teſtator's lands have annually applied, and do now apply, the fourteen pounds to the above uſes, except the increaſe of forty ſhillings annually, which, if boys are not found yearly to be put out apprentice, hath not been added for the benefit of others.—And by a manuſcript in the ſaid pariſh of Burton, dated in 1692, it appears that certain cloſes, called Butcher's Cloſes, in Burton aforeſaid, were exempted from payment of land-tax, being then mentioned to be ſettled for charitable uſes.

[2] In the will of Francis Holbech, dated 24th March, 1737, is contained, inter alia, as follows: "Alſo I give and bequeath unto the ſaid Lawrence Carter, Iſaac Wollaſton, and Thomas Carter, their executors and adminiſtrators, the ſum of £.200. in truſt, to put out to intereſt, and improve as much as they can with the intereſt thereof, to put out apprentices, to ſome good trade or employment, two children of honeſt parents living in ſome of the pariſhes of Loweſby, Cold Newton, Bareſby, Twyford, South Croxton, and Billeſdon, in the ſaid county of Leiceſter, yearly, for ever; and I would not have my truſtees, or their heirs or executors, accountable for the loſs of any money without their own neglect or default." Sir Iſaac Wollaſton, the laſt ſurviving truſtee, received of the executors of the above-named Thomas Carter the ſum of £.288. 5s. as appears by a receipt now in the hands of Iſaac Carter, of Leiceſter, gent. to the following effect; viz. "Received the 22d of June, 1750, of the executors of Mr. Thomas Carter, £.200. being a legacy left by the will of Mr. Francis Holbech, for putting children to apprentices; and alſo £.88. 5s. being the ſhare of the overplus of the effects ariſing from the eſtate of the ſaid Mr. Francis Holbech. I. WOOLLASTON. Witneſs, JOHN DAVIE." Which above-named Sir Iſaac Wollaſton afterwards died inteſtate, as we are induced to believe on ſearching the Prerogative-office, where it appears, that on May 2, 1751, adminiſtration of the goods of the ſaid Sir Iſaac Wollaſton, as dying inteſtate, was granted to Sarah Rowland Wollaſton, his relict; and that, on Nov. 19, 1755, adminiſtration of his goods left unadminiſtered by Sarah was granted to Iſrael Wollaſton, as guardian, to and for the uſe and benefit of Iſaac Lawrence Wollaſton, bart. an infant, Sarah Wollaſton, and Ann Wollaſton, the children of the deceaſed, and until either ſhould come of age. Iſaac Lawrence Wollaſton died a minor; Sarah, the eldeſt daughter, married Taylor White, eſq; who are now both living at Walling Wells, co. [2] "Gabriel Newton, by a deed, dated March 15, 1760, granted to the mayor, bailiffs, and burgeſſes, of Leiceſter, certain eſtates, tithes, &c in truſt, for the payment of £.26. yearly, to the miniſter, churchwardens, and overſeers, of the poor of Aſhby de la Zouch, to be by them applied towards the cloathing, ſchooling, and educating, of 25 boys of indigent parents. The laſt money that was received was due at Lady-day, 1783. I have ſeveral times applied to Mr. Lowdham, attorney, at Leiceſter, who is the corporation's ſolicitor; and his uſual anſwer is, "That a perſon, who pretends to be heir at law to the late Gabriel Newton, has claimed the eſtates; and that it will be improper for the Corporation to pay any more money till the claim of the heir is tried." I cannot learn why the trial is delayed. The pretended heir, I am told, is a man in low life, and now is in Derby gaol. Nor can I learn upon what he grounds his claim. The deed, by which the charity is conveyed, was made ſeveral years before Mr. Newton's death, and inrolled in the court of Chancery. By the ſame deed ſimilar charities were given to other towns. J. Prior." Amended Return.

					The money upon the joint bond of Thomas Oſborn and Richard Sutton, to John Clifford and Rober Starkey, truſtees.	220	0	0	8	16	0

The above articles are from a painted board hung up in the church; which has been there for time immemorial, and is the only record which the pariſh has of moſt of thoſe donations. And ſeveral of the queſtions mentioned by the ſchedule have here no anſwer to them, as the pariſh is not in poſſeſſion of ſufficient teſtimony for that purpoſe. The monies not here accounted for in the annual produce are ſuppoſed to have been laid out in purchaſing land for the uſe of the poor; with ſome other money borrowed to help the purchaſe. But the intereſt of the money borrowed, with other expences upon the land, ſunk the annual produce for the poor to almoſt nothing. Upon the riſe of the value of land, the purchaſed land, which was alſo at a very inconvenient diſtance from Kegworth, was ſold again to conſiderable advantage; and the ſum of £.220. is now out at uſe at four per cent. for the benefit of the poor, and paid to them at Chriſtmas and Eaſter.

[The £.220. mentioned in the return of the 19th of Sept. 1786, is there accounted for, and the grounds of that account as clearly ſpecified as in our power to give. The ſaid £.220. is the clear money that aroſe from the ſale of the land, after paying the money that had been borrowed to help the purchaſe, and other expences attending it. The £.220. is conſidered as the aggregate repreſentative (if it may be ſo called) of the ſeveral donations from the ſeven names in the firſt column of this ſchedule, with conſiderable advantage to the poor. The clear rent from the land, after paying the expences upon it, was only a few ſhillings to the poor: they now receive from this £.220. the yearly payment of £.8. 16*s*.[1]]

Unknown; but ſuppoſed to be one of the family of the Worſley's, who formerly poſſeſſed the manor-houſe, and had the principal eſtate in the pariſh. [N. B. But might in all probability be diſcovered on making ſearch for the will in the proper offices; but no one will be at the expence of making ſuch ſearch [1].]	long before the year 1656; but the preciſe time is not known.	by will, as ſeems to appear from an entry in the pariſh-book for the years 1656, 1657, 1658, 1659.	By ſeveral entries in the pariſh-book of expences of churchwardens and overſeers of the poor, from the year 1656, to the cloſe of the year 1703, it appears that the ſum of £.1. 0s. per annum, £.0. 18s. per annum, Total £.1. 18s. being the rent of the houſes and land, viz. George White, for houſe and land, £.1. 0s. per ann. Mary Shepheard, for houſe and land, £.0. 18s. per ann. Total £.1. 18s. per ann. was applied indifferently; together with moneys raiſed by the poors' levy, to the maintenance of the poor, and all other pariſh charges; but after the year 1703, the pariſhioners ſeem to have made an agreement amongſt themſelves, that the above ſum of £.1. 18s. (being the ſum total of the ſaid rents) ſhould be applied ſolely to the repairs of the church; but this agreement could not poſſibly affect the original deſign of this charity.	One houſe, value £.5. per annum; 4 acres 15 perches of land, value £.10. per annum; one other houſe, value £.3. per annum; 4 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches of land, value £.4. 15s. per annum: total value of two houſes and land £.17. 15s. per annum; but pays no more than £.1. 18s. per annum, which the ſaid houſes and land were let for in the year 1661, to George White and Mary Shepheard, being the true value at that time [2]. [The truſt has not been filled in the memory of any perſon now living [3].]	The houſes and land ſpecified in the former column are not legally veſted in any one perſon whatſoever; the full rent for the ſame was paid to the overſeers of the poor and churchwardens, as obſerved in the former column, in the year 1661, according to the valuation of houſes and land at that time; but as, in proceſs of time, the ſaid houſes and land roſe in value, the poſſeſſors or occupiers ſold the poſſeſſion for a ſum of money, and gave a bond of indemnity to the purchaſers, who continued to pay no more than £.1. 18s. the original rent to the churchwardens. And this manner of conveying the poſſeſſion from one to another, has been carried ſo far, that ſome of the poſſeſſors have even aſſumed a power of deviſing the ſaid houſes and land by will, and left them to their heirs as a freehold, charged with a certain fine or payment of £.1. 18s. which is not the caſe; for the full rent of £.17. 15s. per ann. ought to be paid for the ſaid premiſes. There is an inſtance of part of the purchaſe money, viz. £.5. being paid to the churchwardens.		1 18 0

SWITHLAND.	The minister and churchwarden of the parish of Swithland, in the county of Leicester, in obedience to an Act of Parliament, passed in the 26th year of his present Majesty, intituled, "An Act for procuring, upon Oath, Returns of all Charitable Donations for the Benefit of Poor Persons in the several Parishes and Places within that Part of Great Britain, called "England," do return for answer to certain questions contained in a schedule thereunto annexed, that, to the best of their knowledge and information, there is no charitable donation of any kind for the benefit of poor persons in their parish, unless the sum of two shillings annually, given to four widows, out of the poors rate, falls under that denomination; concerning which, the tradition is, that forty shillings, or some such sum, having been given or left by a person of the name of Biddle (but when or how is not known), for the benefit of four poor widows, it was misapplied to some other purpose; and two shillings a year has ever since been allowed them out of the poors levy as interest for it. Swithland, Sept. 18, 1786. [1] By an act, passed in 1778, for dividing and inclosing the common fields of Kimcote and Walton, in the parishes of Kimcote and Knaptoft, the annual sum of £.5. was allotted to the use of the poor of Kimcote, Walton, and Knaptoft. This connexion of the two parishes will explain what may otherwise appear contradictory in the returns from Knaptoft.

The HISTORY and ANTIQUITIES

OF THE

TOWN and BOROUGH of LEICESTER.

"Atilius licet ferreus, ſed quia verus ſcriptor, libenter eſt lectus." Cic. de Finibus. L. i.

"Ad hiſtoriam ſatis eſt ſi veritas ſincera condiat quæ ſunt ipſâ ſtyli ruſticitate inſipida." Baron. Annal. Tom. VIII.

"Di più, ſotto la pena della perpetua infamia, expreſſamente prohibiamo il poterſi per l' avenire ſcrivere hiſtorie particolari di città alcuna, ſe ella non ſerà Metropoli d'Imperio, di Regno, o di Provincia grande: tutto affine che la pretioſa gioia del tempo e da chi ſcrive, e de chi legge non vonga ſpeſa in coſe vili." Boccalini, Ragguaglio 54.

THE early Ages of Prophane Hiſtory have been long ſince deſervedly named the Unknown and the Fabulous. The Founders of Empires have dropped from the Heavens, or ſprung from the Earth, with equal facility; and the moſt inquiſitive Nations of the World have been content to originate from the Creation of Fancy.

Reſearches, however, into the ſtate and ſituations of our forefathers, when carried on with proper diffidence, and at leaſt the appearance of Authority, are ever grateful, becauſe natural, to the mind of man. The moſt uninformed Indian has his traditionary tale; whilſt European diligence almoſt every where produces, not National only; but even Provincial and Local Hiſtory.

I need not ſay, that every certain notice of early times muſt be deduced from the Sacred Writings: without inſiſting on higher evidence, their accounts of the Origin of Nations are demonſtrably proved by the Progreſſion of Arts and Languages. We may ſafely leave ſome extravagant pretences of Antiquity to the belief of thoſe infatuated Men, who determine to believe nothing elſe.

I know not any Author, who has ventured to ſay much of our Iſland, if indeed it were an Iſland, before the Flood. The famous John Bale[a] aſſures us, that "he was fullye aſſertayned by auncyent "Writyngs, that this Land was with People replenyſhed "longe afore Noe's dayes;" but he tells us nothing more of his authorities: yet Milton[b] himſelf does not ſcruple to accede to him, and thinks, "it may "be inferred with much reaſon, that this Iſle had her "Dwellers, her Affairs, and her Stories, even in that "old World, thoſe many hundred years."

It ſeems to be generally agreed, that the North-Weſtern parts of the Globe, ſince known by the name of Europe, were originally peopled by the Sons of Japhet. Thus far we may go with ſafety: but what ſhall we ſay further?—Gomer the eldeſt is ſuppoſed to have eſtabliſhed his Empire on the Continent, about the beginning of the third Century from the Deluge: and a younger Son, Samothes, to have coloniſed this Iſland, and called it Samothea[c]. Unluckily, however, this latter Tale has no better a foundation, than an improvement of our own Writers on the Forgeries of Annius of Viterbo. Beroſus ſays nothing of this Voyage of Samothes: and Mr. Selden[d] even thinks, that his Name and his Deſcendants, the Samothei, aroſe merely from a caſual Corruption of Language. It were idle, therefore, to ſay any thing more of him or his ſucceſſors: if they ever exiſted, it muſt have been about the Year of the World 2000; an affected Preciſion would be abſurd, where the whole Story is evidently fabulous.

Nor is there any better authority for the Invaſion of Albion[e] the Great; and his Conqueſt by the Tyrian Hercules. Indeed the Phœnicians ſeem very early acquainted with our Coaſts, if Tin were only brought from the Caſſiterides. This metal was known in Paleſtine in the time of Moſes; and, according to Homer, of frequent uſe in the Heroic Ages.

It cannot be doubted, that Britain was firſt peopled from the Continent by the Celtes, or Gauls.

[c] Dr. Haviland rather inclines to Javan. See Archæologia, vol. I. p. 49. Dr. Parſons will have the firſt Inhabitants, Magogians: and they probably ere long may be ſuperſeded by ſome other original People. Theſe Diſquiſitions do no harm, if grave men would not quarrel about them.

[e] This ſon of Neptune was probably brought into exiſtence ſolely to account for the name of our Iſland. Derivations, however, have been made from almoſt every Language under Heaven, and have been denied with equal Confidence. In matters of this kind, Poſitive Aſſertions too often take the place of Proofs: and poſſibly Proofs cannot be had. Etymologiſts are ſeldom at a loſs for what they chuſe to find. At preſent they ſeem to acquieſce in the Celtic, Alb or Alp, expreſſive of the high Cliffs, viſible from the Continent. The Whiteneſs of them was formerly the favourite Syſtem.

This is proved, partly from the Vicinity, and partly from a Compariſon of Manners, Religion, and Languages. Some traces of them are thought to be viſible through ten or twelve Centuries previous to the Chriſtian Æra: Mr. Carte ſuppoſes two Thouſand Years. In ſome of the elder Colonies of theſe we muſt probably look for the Aborigines of Cæſar, and the Indigenæ of Tacitus.]

If, however, we have any faith in the famous Geoffrey of Monmouth (who wrote in the days of king Stephen, ſomewhat more than 600 years ago) our Anceſtors were only a Few Giants before the arrival of Brute and his Trojans. This, according to ſome Chronologers, was in the year of the World 2859. Brute, it ſeems, was a Deſcendant of the pious Æneas; though in what degree, our Authors differ.—That this Story was not the original Compilation of Geoffrey, is well known; but by his means, notwithſtanding the Oppoſition of William of Newbury, and the more incredulous Annaliſts, it grew into Popularity; and Brito, the other Hero of Nennius, (if indeed he were different) was confounded with the former, or no longer remembered. Hence, to be ſure, with the Monkiſh Writers, the Appellation of Britain! Camden has given the old Etymologies, which I ſhall not tranſcribe; and a new one of his own, from Brith, Painted; deſcriptive of the mode of the Britons, who coloured their bodies with Woad, as we learn from various authorities. This conjecture has been much admired; though his Editor, Dr. Gibſon, rather inclines to Mr. Caſaubon's Brydio, from the Rage of the Seas about us; but it may be queſtioned if this properly applies more to our ocean than to any other. The great Bochart diſcovered a Phœnician Source —Baratanac, the Land of Tin: and his followers, amongſt many others, are the famous Boerhaave, and our Hiſtorian, Rapin. Le Clerc offers Brithan, Outer,—the Iſlands in the outer Sea: whilſt Mr. Rowland Jones will have it, that Brittan, Beritan, Bretan, Bredan, or Bryden, is "the incloſing, "LOWER, or ſide-water Port;" and Mr. Macpherſon, on the contrary, declares the original to be Brait-An, the High Country. Dr. Borlaſe, by the help of an Hebrew root, gives us Bre-tania, a Country divided from the Continent; which Mr. Whitaker more immediately brings from the Celtic, Brit: and this ſeems the more eligible opinion.—Concerning the latter Syllable of the Word Britain, we have almoſt as many and as variable Conjectures.

It is to Geoffrey of Monmouth that we are indebted for the earlieſt account of our Town; though the Name had appeared before in the famous Catalogue of Britiſh Cities by Nennius. "God forbid," ſays that grave Antiquary Humphrey Lhuyd, "that we ſhould be ſo impious in any wyſe, "as to deſpiſe the Majeſtie of Antiquity:"—and it would be inexcuſable in the Hiſtorian to paſs by the firſt notices of his ſubject with contempt. Livy more eſpecially allows the Topographer to mix even divine things with human, to add Fable to Truth, that his Foundation may appear more ſacred and honourable.

According to the Britiſh Hiſtory, the Town of Leicester was founded by king Leir, the ſon of Bladud, about the Year of the World 3100, or a little afterwards; at leaſt a Century previous to the Foundation of Rome itſelf!

No Story of the old Kings is ſo well known as that of Leir. The nobleſt Work of our nobleſt Poet has familiariſed it to every one, and will continue its memory to the End of Time.

Perhaps it may be better given in the old Engliſh Rhymes of John Harding, than in the barbarous Latin of Geoffrey himſelf, or the almoſt Saxon of Robert of Glouceſter: eſpecially as a very learned and uſually a very accurate Writer, Dr. Borlaſe, has repeatedly ſaid, by ſome miſtake or other, that our Leir is omitted by Harding.

The Chronicler, after his Account of Bladud, proceeds thus:

"His ſoone was kynge, highe ſette in royaltee,
Of all Brytaynes, by name that kyng Leyr,
Who Laiceter made, after him called to bee
Cair Leyr his citee, that builded was ful fayre.
He had doughters three to bene his heyre;
The firſt of theim was called Gonorelle,
The nexte Ragan, and the youngeſt Cordelle.

Emonges theim as Leyr ſatte on a daye,
He aſked theim howe muche thei him loved.
Gonerell ſaied, more then myſelf ay,
And Ragan ſaied, more then was after proved,
For joye of whiche the kyng was greatly moved,
"I love you more than all this worlde ſo fayre."
He graunted theim two, of three partes to bee heyre.

Cordell the youngeſt then ſayd full ſoberly,
Father, as much as ye been in value,
So muche I love you, and ſhall ſikirly
At all my might and all my hearte full trewe:
With that he greved at her and changed hewe,
Sene thou me loves leſs then thy ſiſters twain,
The leeſt porcion ſhalt thou have of Bretain.

With that Maglan duke of Albany
Gonorell wedded, and had the lande all out;
Euen of Wales and of Cornewayle thereby
That duke was of thoſe twoo landes ſtoute,
Ragan wedded: to whiche twoo dukes no doubte
Kyng Leyr gave rule and governaunce
Of all Brytain, for age and none puiſſaunce.

A Temple he made in this citee of Kaireleir,
A flamyne alſo, as he a biſhop were,
In name of Janus the folke into it repere:
And then he went Gonorell to require
Of the greate love that ſhe aught hym ſo dere;
But of her promiſe ſhe failed unkyndly,
Wherefore he wente unto Ragan in hie.

She failed alſo for all her greate promiſe;
And to Cordell that wedded was into Fraunce
Long after he wente in greate deſtres
To helpe to wynne hym his heritaunce.
She ſuccurred hym anon with all pleſaunce
Both with gold and ſilver of right greate quantitee
To get his lande again in all ſuertee.

Aganippe her lorde was kyng of Fraunce,
That graunte hym menne and good ſufficiente,
And ſent his wyfe with hym with greate puiſſaunce,
With all aray, that to her was apente,
His heire to been by their bothes aſſente;
For he was olde, and might not well travail
In his perſone, the warres to prevaill.

Kyng Leyr thus wanne his lande with all might,
And reigned well there after full thre yere,
And died ſo, buryed at Kairleir menne ſain
In Janus temple: in whiche tyme for age clere
The kyng of Fraunce, Aganippe, in fere
Died; wherefore Cordell his heire was ſoo
To rule Brytain alone withouten moo.

Cordell, quene of Fraunce, and doughter to kyng Leir,
Quene of Englande after her father's daie,
Five yeres reigned, as for her father's heire,
And governed well the realme, all men to paye.
Hir ſiſter's ſonne, then Morgan of Albany,
And Condage alſo of Cambre and Cornewaill,
In battail greate, her tooke and putte in baill.

For ſorow then ſhe ſlew her ſelf for tene,
And buryed was by ſide her father right,
In Janus temple, which Kyng Leyr made I wene
At Kairleir, ſo that now Laiceſtre hight.
Thus died this quene that was of muche might:
Her ſoule went to Janus, whom ſhe ſerved,
And to Minerva, whoſe love ſhe had deſerved.

The induſtrious Mr. Staveley, whoſe reſearches into the early hiſtory of this town[1] have much facilitated our preſent labours, begins thus:

"Of the four parts or quarters of the Habitable World, Europe is deſervedly preferred; and amongſt the Kingdoms thereof, this Iſland of Great Britain, in many particulars, yields not a precedence to any other. That part of this renowned Iſland, called England, being divided into Shires or Counties, by Alfred the Saxon Monarch, as all Hiſtorians agree; this of Leiceſter, lying in the very midſt of the land, reſembles very much the ſhape and form of a Heart, the moſt noble and worthy part of any Creature, as by the Chorography and Maps thereof it doth appear. And in the heart and centre of this Shire ſtands this Town of Leiceſter, moſt commodiouſly to receive the affluence of the ambient County, and to communicate its influence by traffick and commodities into all the diviſions and quarters of the Shire: and, being ſeated in an excellent air and ſoil, with the great Antiquity thereof, ſpeaks the wiſdom, care, and foreſight of the firſt builders, and ſubſequent reſtorers thereof: for, as things of ſlight continuance ſeldom boaſt of any conſiderable duration to the reproach or cenſure of their authors; ſo thoſe which are begun and founded with a true foreſight and right judgement, continue long as laſting monuments of their founder's ſkill and excellence. We will therefore, in the firſt place, attempt ſomething towards and in order to the diſcovery of the original of this ancient town; premiſing, that its very great age makes us deſpair of attaining its very firſt riſe and birth; and therefore we will endeavour to approach as near it as we can, and as any hiſtorical evidence will carry us.

"That great diver into the depth of Antiquity, Mr. Camden, ſays, that this Town made an evident fair ſhow of great Antiquity; and, if any where, we might juſtly have hoped to have found its age and birth in that great Regiſter. But it was not the practice of that learned man to obtrude uncertainties upon the world, and he adventures poſitively no further. If therefore its vaſtly diſtant foundation was ſo undiſcernible to ſuch an eagle eye, we may well fear it will be out of our reach.

"That it is very antient, our ordinary Almanack Chronologers deliver, that it is above 2500 years ſince the building of Leiceſter: indeed I confeſs that the credit of theſe men is not very great; yet it is far ſafer to believe them à parte poſt, then à poſt ante. But it is agreed by all writers, that Leiceſter was a City or Town in the time of the Britains, long before the Romans coming hither; and indeed the variations of its name demonſtrate, that it hath borne up amongſt, and ſuffered the impoſition from, antique and various times and people. Its firſt name I take to have been Caer-Lerion; afterwards, and ſome time, Lege-ceſtria, Leogora, Legeoceſter; and laſtly Leiceſter; not to omit the probable conjecture of our before-named great Antiquary, that in the Romans' time it was called Ratæ; but why or wherefore I could never yet apprehend. But of this more anon.

"Sufficiently is known the tradition handed to us by a multitude of writers, that there were here antiently in Britain twenty-eight Flamens, and three Arch-flamens, placed in ſo many cities; and that theſe, upon the converſion of king Lucius and the Britains to the Chriſtian faith, about 180 years after the birth of our Saviour, were transformed into ſo many Biſhops' ſees: concerning all which the moſt incomparable Primate Uſher[2] gives us plentiful ſatisfaction; and venerable Bede, in the entrance to his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Britain, ſays, "Britain "was heretofore honoured with eight and twenty "cities[3];" taking the ſame from Gildas, the moſt antient Britiſh writer, who ſays, "Britain adorned "with twice ten and twice four cities[4]."
